UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO
3 1761 01478165 2

Medieval Studies

(FIRST SERIES)

SECOND REVISED EDITION

WITH THREE APPENDICES

BY

G. G. COULTON, M.A.

AUTHOR OF

From St. Francis to Dante, Chaucer and his England, A Medieval Garner, etc., etc.

13891.2

26/6/16

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON,
KENT & Co., Ltd.

1915

BR
252
C68
1915

Preface to First Edition.

THESE essays, mostly reprinted from the Reviews, are intended to defend the moderate Anglican position against the misrepresentations of writers who disparage modern civilisation in comparison with a purely imaginary and unhistorical idea of medieval life.

The Author attempts to show how much is lost, even from the purely picturesque point of view, by thus sacrificing plain truth to false sentiment; for we shall never see the great men of the past in their full greatness until we realize the difficulties under which they lived and worked. Although the Studies are necessarily controversial to this extent, they are written entirely from orthodox pre-reformation sources, no others being quoted except here and there in corroboration of facts already established: since the curse of Church history is the too frequent habit of writing from second-hand or partisan documents.

As the plan of these pamphlets renders it impossible to give a crowd of references which would only weary the general reader, the Author is glad to give a definite guarantee of his good faith by offering four pages in each pamphlet to any competent critic who will undertake to convict him of serious error. If his statements are inaccurate, he thus undertakes to supply their refutation at his own expense. He has already made a similar offer in vain to many Romanist controversialists, including all the writers of the Catholic Truth Society; and he now repeats the offer, in order to enable the general reader to realize how strongly Anglicanism is supported on many important points by the most incontrovertible medieval testimony.

Preface to Second Edition.

THESE papers, though occasional and to a great extent controversial, have one general purpose in view—to justify the main trend of modern culture. Strongly as the author sympathizes with the triumph of medieval over classical civilization, he is equally convinced of the necessity of outgrowing the Middle Ages. St. Augustine had to combat a formidable reactionary party which attributed all the evils of the fifth century to Rome's abandonment of her old gods ; we, in the twentieth century, have still to combat a similar reaction towards institutions which have lost the universal obedience which they once commanded. Whatever may be our attempts to solve the riddle of the universe, whether in the religious or in the secularist sense, much must depend upon the appeal to history. To a great extent, our theory of life and our hopes for the future must be based upon the facts of the past ; and any falsification of those facts must therefore, in the long run, impede true social progress. Opinions will always differ widely and legitimately ; but many facts of history might be established with practical certainty, if only we were willing to take a little more trouble. The difference between a Catholic, a Protestant, and an Agnostic is often even more philosophical than historical. And those differences could be far more tolerantly discussed if only all parties could agree more nearly on matters of ascertainable fact : the widest dividing gulf is the suspicion, on one side or the other, of careless mis-statements, or even of literary dishonesty.

This is the main reason for a second edition of these essays ; though the author, when the question was raised early in 1914, had decided against republication. In the first edition, he merely exposed such mis-statements of Abbot Gasquet's as came directly in his way. To these exposures, though supported by unexceptionable documents of the Middle Ages, the Abbot never directly replied ; and now he publicly claims his promotion to the Cardinalate as an Apostolic testimonial to his historical scholarship.[1] To abstain from republication might therefore have encouraged the impression, openly expressed in many quarters, that the Cardinal's main contentions are in general based upon actual documentary evidence, and that the points on which that evidence fails him are few and negligible. The author has therefore added to this new edition a rough list of such blunders and mis-statements of facts as he has noted during a far from exhaustive study of the Cardinal's books and of their professed sources. These 54 pages of criticism may enable students to realize the true meaning of Cardinal Manning's famous dictum, that the appeal to History is a treason and a heresy ; or again of Cardinal Newman's despairing answer to the suggestion of founding a Catholic Historical Review. " Who would bear it ? " wrote Newman : " unless one doctored all one's facts, one would be thought a bad Catholic." In short, just as these Studies were first printed because some plain protest seemed necessary against the habitual distortion of historical facts by Ultramontane writers, who profess to rely upon actual documents, so they are now reprinted because that protest seems still necessary, and because the author's silence, in the face of claims recently made by, and in behalf of, the new Cardinal, might seem like allowing judgment to go by default.

1. See Appendix II.

The English official historian seems sometimes a little excessive in his disregard of the general public. Even our Professors had not always realized, until a few months ago, how successfully the ideas of millions can be moulded by the steady influence of teachers who preach plausible untruths systematically ex cathedra ; and, in this direction, Ultramontanism has exploited our indolence as steadily as Imperialist Militarism. It was of the Ultramontanes that Pascal complained " they find it easier to produce monks than reasons " ; and the same Pope who promoted Abbot Gasquet to the purple had previously put Loisy and Duchesne upon the Index. Here, in a nutshell, is the key to the furious anti-clericalism of France, Italy, and Spain ; it is the inevitable reaction of a long-poisoned public opinion. Moreover, even our official historians are more truly products of contemporary public opinion than they themselves always realize ; for they pick up many of their ideas in Clubland, which in its turn owes them to the man in the street. English historians of the highest rank have lately lent themselves, whether through neglect or ignorance, to the comedy of exploiting a political honour as proof presumptive of historical accuracy. They have looked aside from the high interests entrusted to them, and have publicly condoned, in their own domain of History, what would never have been forgiven by men of equal distinction in the domain of Natural Science. If any zoologist of repute had based an important theory upon the alleged total absence of felidae from the fauna of Borneo, and if another zoologist had replied by producing thirteen visible and tangible specimens of different felidae, there might indeed have been much curious speculation concerning the causes of the original error. But one thing is certain ; the peccant theorist would never have dared to republish, without a single word of apology, his original mis-statement of fact, and his original theories based upon that falsehood. Or, even if it were remotely conceivable that he should have done so, we may at least feel assured that his speculations would have been tabooed in all serious scientific circles until he had repented and made public amends. If, moreover, for political reasons, some Prime Minister had presently raised him to a peerage, certainly the President of the Royal Society, with two other equally distinguished scientists, would not have joined a committee formed for the purpose of offering him a public testimonial. In the realm of Natural Science, public opinion is too strong and too healthy to permit such things ; and, if it be true that History cannot purge herself of her own dross by the same straightforward methods, then History is irrevocably doomed to that hopelessly inferior rank to which too many readers are already inclined to relegate her. Let us, however, have faith in the ultimate victory of the public conscience. A century hence, the facts to which I am here calling attention will very likely seem almost incredible —almost as incredible as it seems to us that Pitt should have been the first Paymaster who refused to enrich himself by robbing the army officers of £30,000 a year. But, in the meantime, it is difficult to trace any definite and immediate sign of an awakening conscience. We can scarcely assert that the tone of literary morality is higher in this field than it was fifty years ago; and this is my main reason for deciding upon a republication which might otherwise have been postponed altogether.

One essay has been omitted, because I have since published its contents in From St. Francis to Dante; another has been added in its place (No. 2). Minor alterations have been made to bring the essays up to date, and small slips have been corrected. My inferences from Bp. Nicke's visitations (p. 3) were vehemently attacked at the time by a Roman Catholic theologian in a letter to a common friend; but I was not permitted to publish this, and in fact his severest criticisms rested upon certain popular theories, as to the nature of medieval visitation documents, which are now abandoned by the majority of competent students.[1] I have, however, revised Nicke's evidence in the light of these criticisms, and find that I had rather understated than overstated my case. On no other point, so far as I am aware, have my facts been questioned, though a good many scholars may disagree with my deductions.

Appendix I. is designed to raise my criticisms as much as possible out of the sphere of scattered detail. The piecemeal character of the papers here reprinted might otherwise encourage the notion, expressed by the late Mgr. Benson, that I am a pedant who has found a few mistakes in Cardinal Gasquet's work, and who cannot look beyond these small flaws to the main issues involved. I contend, on the contrary, that we have here one of the broadest and most vital of historical issues. Is History to be written without documentary references, or even with indefensibly false references, by authors who are under every personal and professional temptation to see only one side? or, on the other hand, must we not all gain by submitting our prepossessions to the wholesome pressure of outside opinion, by giving full and accurate references, and by imitating at least the formal honesty of the children of this world, who know that their whole public credit depends upon the soundness of their business vouchers? I have therefore put together, in this Appendix I, a rough list of nearly 200 blunders and mis-statements noted during a perusal, sometimes cursory and sometimes detailed, of most of the Cardinal's books. The list could probably be made far longer if this were worth while; but for most readers it will probably suffice as it stands, and will tell its own tale plainly enough.

1. See my article on The Interpretation of Visitation Documents in the English Historical Review for Jan. 1914, Mr. R. C. Fowler, of the Public Record Office, had already expressed much the same conclusions in his preface to Baldock's Register, which I ought to have noticed in my article; and three other editors of visitation documents have since written to assure me of their full agreement.

Table of Contents.

		PAGE
I.	The Monastic Legend	1
II.	A Revivalist of Six Centuries Ago	19
III.	Side-Lights on the Franciscans	27
IV.	The High Ancestry of Puritanism	37
V.	Romanism and Morals	46
VI.	The Truth about the Monasteries	54
VII.	Religious Education before the Reformation	69
	Appendices	79

I.

The Monastic Legend.

"To manipulate ancient writings, to edit history in one's own favour, did not appear criminal [in the "Ages of Faith"] if the end in view were otherwise just and good."—Dr. W. BARRY (Papal Monarchy, p. 133).

THE very thoroughness of the Reformation is, in one sense, its weakness. Modern morals are already so far removed from the medieval, that Anglicans are ready to disbelieve the most undoubted scandals of the past; and modern tolerance listens candidly to the misrepresentations of writers whose shrift in pre-reformation days would have been short. In the face of opponents who devote their lives not only to exposing the real faults and foibles of the Reformers, but also to raking up scandal against them from the most tainted sources, one is driven sometimes to the pertinent retort that, even if all these things were true, matters were incomparably worse in the "Ages of Faith." But the very strength of this argument from the point of view of historical truth makes it very difficult of use in modern society; just as, in good company, the very grossness of a man's defects may save him from the obvious retort which would crush him at once among his own class. Thus, the modern Romanist controversialist finds a real protection, for a time at least, in the very unsavouriness of certain chapters of medieval Church History. Cardinal Gasquet—I name him as the most brilliant writer on the particular subject with which I propose to deal—has argued for the last twenty years, with very considerable show of historical apparatus, that the Dissolution of the Monasteries was an act of unredeemed iniquity, and that the blood of these innocent men is still on our heads. Many students who are convinced of the contrary have yet been reluctant to enter upon a somewhat invidious discussion; and, meanwhile, the Cardinal has found his strongest ally in the comparative decency of modern society. That which, before the Reformation, was proclaimed daily without reserve—by sinners with wanton laughter, and by saints with bitter tears—is too shocking to be lightly believed by men who know what their own clergy have been for generations past, and who have never seen the monastic system at work except under the safeguards afforded by modern laws and modern publicity. If we may believe a certain section of the Press, Cardinal Gasquet has been lecturing in America with conspicuous success on the innocence of the medieval monks and the sin of their suppression. He is apparently about to repeat these lectures in England: it is, therefore, time to abandon the attitude of distant scepticism, and to look closely into arguments which, if sound, would call for an act of national repentance.

Six years ago, in going through a course of Roman apologetics, I came upon Cardinal Gasquet's book. It struck me from the first page as extraordinarily inconsistent with original documents; and one point specially arrested my attention. The Cardinal claims that "anything like general immorality was altogether unknown among the Religious of England. This much is clearly proved by the testimony of the acts of Episcopal visitations . . . ."[1] I read this with some surprise: for I knew a little of English visitation acts, and they seemed to me to point clearly to the opposite conclusion. It was necessary, therefore, to make sure first of all which were the documents to which he appealed in support of a statement which, if correct, might almost have spared him the trouble of writing all the rest of his book. I therefore expressed my doubts by letter to him, pointing out that his mere general reference to "the Episcopal Registers" or "the Acts of Episcopal Visitation" was no reference at all; and begging him therefore to supply this grave omission by letter. To save him trouble, and for the sake of a clear understanding, I enclosed a list of the score of volumes containing Episcopal Visitations which I knew to be accessible to the general student, requesting him to initial those upon which he could rely as supporting his statement, and to draw his pen through those for which he could not answer from personal study. At the receipt of my letter, he was unfortunately under the doctor's orders; but when I repeated my request six months later his answer was final. It amounted to a confession that he had forgotten the very names of the books on which he had professed to base the most sweeping and vital statement, perhaps, in his whole history.[2] His book had, indeed, surprised me at first by the easy familiarity which it claimed en bloc with documents so bulky, and so laborious to study, as the Episcopal Registers: all the greater, therefore, was my surprise to find him now pleading that, without much search among his notes, he could not even name such of these twenty volumes as he had studied and could safely appeal to. In this embarrassment, I was driven to make what I could out of the Cardinal's footnotes. I found that the Episcopal Acts are, in fact, quoted somewhat sparingly—far less freely than many other books of infinitely less historical value. Some of the references, being to volumes still unprinted, are difficult to verify; but, fortunately, by far the most important are to books which, though still in MS. when he wrote, have since been printed. These are, firstly, the Exeter Registers, to which one very confident appeal is made, though apparently at second-hand; and secondly, the Norwich Visitations of Bishop Nicke, to which he thrice appeals for confirmation of some of his most sweeping statements.[3] This simplifies the problem a good deal. In the days when the

1. I. 38. My quotations are from the 3rd edition, 1888.

2. I have these letters by me, and will gladly print them with the Cardinal's leave.

3. Of the six Exeter volumes only the least important had been published when Cardinal Gasquet wrote.

learned Cardinal did know which Registers he had or had not read, he appealed specially to the records of Exeter and Norwich, as proving (1) the methods of visitation, (2) the fact that there was "nothing like general immorality" in the monasteries, (3) that, for any grave breach of the Rule, punishment was stern and unsparing, such as the instance which he quotes in full from a York Register.[1] Here, then, is a plain issue, which I will test first by Nicke, from whose "two valuable volumes" he claims support in the most emphatic words. "Nothing like general immorality" is, of course, a somewhat vague plea: we find, for instance, an earnest and learned Roman Catholic apologist in France congratulating himself that the Thirteenth Century Visitations of Rouen show no more than thirty-three unchaste nuns out of a total of 373, or nine per cent.[2] Cardinal Gasquet, however, has evidently a far higher ideal of monastic chastity; for he claims that the registers give us a picture very different from that of Henry's visitation, which, after all, accused scarcely more than three per cent. of immorality.[3] Yet, on Nicke's first visitation of his diocese, in 1514, he found nearly double of that percentage suspected by their fellow monks or nuns of immorality. The arguments which fill nine-tenths of the cardinal's two bulky volumes are meant to prove that the reports of Henry VIII's commissioners are too bad to be credible. In the course of these arguments he appeals confidently to the support of certain episcopal visitations, still in manuscript, but well-known to himself. When these are printed, it transpires that they yield a statistical result far less favourable than Henry VIII's![4] And the most inexplicable error is still to come. We are twice referred to Nicke for proof that grave faults were vigorously punished.[5] Yet, (to take one grave fault only) Nicke found thirty-three monks or nuns suspected of incontinence by their fellows. In fifteen, at least, of these cases, either a child had been born, or Nicke's injunctions show that he held the charge to be founded. Yet he records only two punishments; though in one other case, which was already ancient history, we hear that the prior himself had "corrected" it at the time. Of the two punishments recorded, one was inflicted upon an unchaste nun, and runs as follows: "The Lord Bishop . . . . . enjoined on the Lady Agnes Smyth that she should sit for a whole month below all the other nuns, and should repeat during that period the whole Psalter seven times over." The other offender was the Prior of Walsingham, who had habitually embezzled moneys, stolen jewels and plate from the treasury, committed manslaughter on a peasant, and exalted John Smyth's wife to a quasi-official position as his own helpmate. The bishop ordered the summary dismissal of Mrs. Smyth, and within six weeks he had prevailed upon the prior to resign his office,

1. I, 36 note, 334 note: cf. 355.

2. E. du Méril, in Soc. des Antiq. de Normandie, 1847, p. 125.

3. I, 352. Elsewhere the cardinal reckons the total of monks, friars and nuns at 8,000 (Vol. II, p. 323). Assuming that figure, the 250 cases reported give us 3.1 per cent. The numbers in Nicke are 332 monks and nuns, with twenty cases of immorality, i.e. 6.1 per cent.

4. The later visits show considerably less; but there are many obvious reasons why a first visit should show a worse record than others. After all, Henry's also was a first visit.

5. I, 36 note, 334 note.

under assurance of " a competent annual pension " for the rest of his life. Again, the Prior of Aldby complains to Nicke against the system of banishing " incorrigible " monks to the smaller priories, where they spent their days in dicing and indiscipline.[1] There are several complaints against drunken monks, but none are punished—indeed Dr. Rashdall has pointed out that drunkenness was not recognised as a punishable offence by the medieval Oxford statutes. The gravest peculations and betrayals of trust are recorded without punishment. An excellent case is that of Wymondham in 1514. The late abbot had peculated ; the present abbot had not rendered his accounts. The prior had broken open a chest and abstracted documents without the abbot's leave ; had tried to kill two fellow-monks with a sword ; had thrown a stone at another in the abbot's presence ; had not been to confession for nine months. When threatened with my Lord Bishop's displeasure, he had said : " tell my Lord both and my Ladie, for I care nott " ; the sting of which lay no doubt in the fact that Nicke's own morals were in evil repute among his contemporaries. The night services were often neglected, the choice books and ornaments were out of repair : other books had been stolen. There was no schoolmaster. Some monks had broken the cloister bounds. One was a drunkard, had openly denied the Resurrection of the Dead in the Flesh, absented himself from matins, and was suspected of adultery. Another's cell was frequented by " suspected women," two married, and two of the widow's daughters at the abbey dairy. Another was grievously suspected of adultery. One of the confessors had broken the seal of confession, and the prior complained that his attempt at reform had caused the monks to " blaspheme his name in public places without the monastery." This would seem a sufficiently heavy bill of offences for a community of eleven monks ; I here subjoin, word for word, all the notice the Bishop takes of it. " The Lord Bishop enjoined that henceforth no layman should be admitted to any office within the aforesaid abbey until he had first pledged himself to keep faithfully the secrets of the abbey. He further enjoined that he (the abbot) should elect another monk in the prior's place within a month. After which injunctions and the aforesaid evidence taken, my Lord concluded his visitation for this time." The deposed prior was succeeded in that office by one of the worst sinners of a previous visitation (p. 161). I must beg the reader to note the words I have italicized, for I shall recur to them. In the meantime I only wish to point out how these MS. volumes, when printed, contradict Cardinal Gasquet flatly by showing an impunity almost incredible to modern readers ; yet, (as I am ready to prove, if necessary), absolutely normal in the Middle Ages.

So much for Nicke's evidence : now for that of the Exeter Registers. Cardinal Gasquet argues, with an emphasis which may seem even exaggerated, that the Black Death of 1349 dealt a blow to the monasteries, materially and morally, from which they had not yet recovered at the Dissolution (1. 7.) Therefore, in choosing the first twenty-one years (1327-48) of the Register of Bishop Grandisson, perhaps the greatest of all the medieval bishops of Exeter, I am choosing a field which ought to be eminently favourable to Cardinal Gasquet. How far this is so, the reader may judge from the history of three monasteries which I find extracted in my notes.

1. pp. 197, 265. Cellulas is used here, as sometimes elsewhere, in the sense of cellas.

(1) St. James' Priory, near Exeter. In 1334 (p. 279) the prior of this house, William de Bittendene, is stigmatized as "oftentimes convicted of embezzlement and fornication, and lately refusing to allow himself to be visited . . . pretending himself exempt," in spite of documentary evidence to the contrary. The priory was waste, the church in ruins, and divine service had ceased. The bishop excommunicated him and tried to sequestrate the revenues of his priory. In 1335 he was "wandering about the country, having let loose the reins of honesty and utterly cast away the modesty of his monastic profession," and the Bishop therefore writes sadly to the prior of the parent house of St. Martin "Would that you would send some good man to rule the said house: for this person fears neither God nor man, which is a blot upon the honour of monasticism and justly offends God's majesty." In 1338, however, William was still prior, and the bishop wrote of his past "enormously dissolute life" without implying any present amendment. Next year we find him again as prior, and noted among the clergy who have not paid the last tax to the Pope. There is no record of his being deposed (pp. 71, 279, 289, 305, 745, 883).

(2) Tavistock Abbey. In 1328 Grandisson wrote to the Pope, his good friend and patron, "God is my witness that I lie not: the Abbot of Tavistock in my diocese, a native of Aquitaine, now promoted by your Holiness through the deceit of others, hath since his first arrival held himself aloof from all religion and all worship of God." This was Robert Bonus, who had previously been Abbot of La Réole in Gascony. The bishop, out of reverence for the Pope and his noble French friends, had first "coaxed him gently to myself" and then, when kindness failed, had threatened his own wrath and the Pope's; but both alike in vain. Bonus had already begun to waste the abbey revenues, and "in a fit of drunkenness, had almost slain" a young French squire of his own retinue. Grandisson, though a man of noble birth, high attainments, great force of will, and special favour with the Pope, was quite unable to enlist the help of the Papal court. On the contrary, in 1333 he had to justify himself to some of the cardinals for such pressure as he had dared to bring upon Bonus, over whose morals he thinks it better to draw a veil, "out of reverence to your Paternity and to his Order." "In these days especially, wherein the wickedness of the human race is increasing" it is almost impossible for a prelate to do his duty without incurring slander: he therefore prays his friends at the Court to credit no reports of his alleged indiscretions, or illegalities, until at least they have heard his own version of the matter. How little he deserved such accusations, his own letters to the erring abbot prove only too clearly. As early as 1328, he found himself compelled by popular outcry to come and visit the abbey: but, the abbot having put in the usual plea of exemption, he offered to waive his episcopal rights, and come informally as a friend. It was only in 1333, when both cajolery and threats had proved unavailing, that the bishop proceeded to sequestrate the revenues of the house, whose abbot " wasteful not only of goods but also of his own fame, is leading and is wont to lead a life detestable to God and man, publicly and daily eating flesh in Lententide without reasonable cause, and damnably committing very many other enormous offences which we pass in silence through reverence for the monastic order and profession." He " has notoriously so dilapidated and consumed the monastery's property that it is now brought to the disgrace of almost irreparable ruin," and that " some monks of the convent have needed to be sent wandering abroad to beg for their bare daily livelihood." Therefore, " lest the wickedness of this his obstinacy and dilapidation escape utterly unpunished," since he has already scorned our mandate of sequestration and excommunication, we commit to the Abbot of Buckland and certain other monks the duty of seeing our orders strictly obeyed. Moreover, since he has set us at nought and refused to appear before us, we hereby depose him (pp. 97, 98, 109, 395, 405, 703-6, 717).

Nor was this the end of troubles at Tavistock. The prior and monks put the choice of a new abbot in the bishop's hands, and the latter chose John de Courtenay, whom he had before selected as one of those who were to enforce his sentence against the late abbot. Grandisson, in his joy at getting rid of Bonus, described his new choice as " a man recommended by many virtuous gifts " : but he was soon bitterly undeceived. Only five years later, he finds the abbey again bankrupt and suffering from " certain proved faults both in the Head and in the Members, which we, willing to spare your reputation, have thought best to pass over in silence for the present." He cuts off the abbot from all share in the money affairs of the house, banishes him from the precincts until the debt shall be paid, orders him to abandon his unmonastic foppishness of dress, and directs that one of his fellow monks, " recommended by his honesty and cleanliness of life " should be always in attendance on him as chaplain, and sleep in his chamber. Meanwhile he is to have, for his own and chaplain's support, a pension of 120 marks —or about £1600 a year of modern money—the rest of the monks being put off with 100 marks a year between them. Seven years later, in 1345, Grandisson visited the abbey, and found " very many faults ; some of which—to say nothing for the present of the greatest and most grievous —we set forth clearly to you." The abbot has again relapsed into secular finery, and has imitators among the monks ; three of them have " frequently offended hitherto by casting off their monastic habit." Nearly all the monks ate forbidden flesh in their own cells. The abbot had been proved to " consort day and night with secular persons, even of suspected morals, in damnable contempt of our former mandates " : on which account the bishop again directs that a monk of acknowledged purity of life should act as his chaplain, be always with him, and sleep in his chamber. The monastic moneys were wasted on a pack of hounds, and two of the monks had been guilty of embezzlement. In 1348 again the abbot, " defamed by many excesses and crimes well-known to you and to the whole convent " has not only for many years wasted the abbey property ; but " finding no more moveable goods wherewith further to satisfy his pleasures," has begun to sell and alienate even farms and rents. The beautiful buildings were falling to ruin; and the monks were as deformed in inward religion as was their abbey in outward aspect. The bishop therefore decrees the abbot's suspension. He is no longer to enjoy his liberal pension, but " removing all his costly retinue and all hunting dogs whatsoever," to live in common with the rest of the monks. A few months afterwards came the Black Death, and we hear no more of John de Courtenay (pp. 887, 889, 996-8).

(3) BARNSTAPLE PRIORY. This was a cell to St. Martin des Champs at Paris. In 1332 the prior was John de Gemma, who preferred Paris life, and did not reside, " to the grave peril of the souls committed to his charge, and as a pernicious example to very many others." The bishop therefore sequestrated the priory revenues to compel his return, and took proceedings against one John of Paris who had intruded himself as prior during the real prior's absence. The prior of St. Martin, instead of sending the latter back to his work, appointed in his stead one John Soier. Grandisson then wrote to St. Martin's, begging earnestly and almost humbly that this appointment might be quashed: " otherwise, we beg you not to take it ill even if we freely use our right of reforming those points on which, with bitterness of heart, we perceive the said priory [of Barnstaple] to need reformation. For we must tell you truly that Bro. John Soier, your monk and presentee, is said, as one who is prodigal both of his reputation and of his salvation, to have lived in Wales a life so enormously dissolute (even begetting a family and bringing it up notoriously at the expense of church goods, and likewise publicly defamed of the vice of simony recently committed here at Barnstaple for the aforesaid reasons, and suspected of future embezzlement), that he himself should rightly fear to climb to the high post of prior of this monastery, and we must fear to admit him against our own conscience." The protest was utterly unavailing: and one of the strongest bishops, in perhaps the most independent of all great European countries, found himself compelled to accept this ruffian as prior of Barnstaple! In 1334 Soier died, but that brief space of two years had sufficed to justify all the bishop's fears. In protesting against the prior of St. Martin's sudden recall of the new prior after only a few months' residence in England, Grandisson writes: " If you often acted thus, the priory would be ruined and all observance of religion dissolved. . . . For the present income, and even all that will come in for a long time hence, will scarce suffice for the bare necessities of the prior and his monks at that house; since his accursed predecessor (I say it with shame) together with one John Colecote his abettor, have inhumanly dealt the priory almost irreparable harm."

Let me point out here the full significance of this evidence. Cardinal Gasquet appeals to the Exeter Registers to prove two main points (1) " The graver irregularities which are recorded against the religious after the most searching scrutiny, made by the bishops or their commissioners, are after all few and far between "; and (2) " the extreme punishment with which such irregularities were visited proves that, so far from not being heeded, the moral reputation of the monastic and conventual establishments was considered of the first importance." Let me take those two points in order.

(1) The rarity of immorality in the diocese cannot possibly be proved from the Episcopal Registers: for the registers do not contain any full accounts of monastic visitations. It is most important to insist upon this point, since it is almost always blinked by apologists.[1] The actual Visitation records were written in separate rolls or books which have seldom survived and still more seldom been published.[2] The Bishops' Registers themselves contain only here and there a few extracts from, or allusions to, these records, in cases where the gross scandal of the offence, or the sinners' contumacy, rendered the usual summary proceeding unavailing, and necessitated special aud repeated attention from the bishop himself. Even in these cases, the misdemeanours are constantly veiled in a cloud of phrases, to avoid scandal. They therefore no more present a full record of serious monastic offences than the Journals of the House of Lords present a full record of the offences of British subjects.[3] If I am right in this assertion—and I offer Cardinal Gasquet the chance of contradicting me within the covers of this very pamphlet, besides the fact that here at least I have on my side a determined defender of monastic morality—then it shows sheer ignorance of the true facts to speak of the silence of the registers (where they are silent) as proving the innocence of the monks. The registers can at most offer us only records of a few cases (not necessarily even the worst), and leave us to infer vaguely from these samples what the batch was like.

(2) This brings me to Cardinal Gasquet's second contention—that the Exeter Registers prove " the extreme punishment with which irregularities were visited." On the contrary, they entirely agree with that of Nicke in proving exactly the opposite. This exceptionally strong and determined Grandisson, with his exceptional influence at the Pope's court, is obliged to accept a notorious adulterer as prior of Barnstaple without hint of his punishment, and is quite unable to bring to justice the equally notorious prior of St. James's, or even to get rid of him from his priory.

1. An Athenæum reviewer, who seems to be responsible for several articles containing obiter dicta in defence of monastic morality, has apparently at last begun to realize this truth. (April 22, 1905, p. 490). This may be connected with the fact that I pointed it out a year or two ago in a letter addressed to the editor, begging the reviewer at about the same time to jot me down on a postcard (without prejudice to his anonymity) full references to a manuscript which he cited as proving monastic innocence. I received no reply to my request for this reference: but my trouble has not been wasted if I have at last made him understand that the registers do not profess to record Visitation comperta with any completeness.

2. Nicke's and Goldwell's visitations are of this kind: and Cardinal Gasquet evidently recognizes this, though only dimly (p. 36, note), and without realizing the crucial importance of the difference to his argument. (See, for a fuller discussion of this question, my article in the English Historical Review for January, 1914).

3. This accounts for the striking fact that the worst cases are to be found in the registers of the strongest and best bishops. Grandisson's gives us a far worse picture of clerical morality than that of his predecessor Stapledon or his successors Brantyngham and Stafford, who were all three great ministers, busy to their finger-tips with state affairs, and compelled to treat the government of their diocese as a secondary matter. Stafford, the best of them, spent scarcely more than half his twenty-five years' episcopate in active episcopal work. Abuses which such men winked at or compounded with, Grandisson fought against with all his might; and hence his register shows us more immoralities than theirs, though nobody who knows the character and work of the four bishops can doubt that the diocese was in a far better state of discipline under him.

It costs him a struggle of five years to get rid of Bonus, and he has scarcely less difficulty with Courtenay!

Here again the very strength of my case is, in a measure, its weakness. Is it credible, the reader may well ask, that a writer of such reputation can have referred the unsuspecting public so confidently to MS. sources which contradict him so flatly on such simple issues? I cannot say how far it is credible, I only say that it is true, and that I will willingly affirm its truth by the one guarantee in my power—by offering to put myself in the pillory if I am wrong. Before publishing this pamphlet I will gladly allow Cardinal Gasquet eight pages in it for any denials or explanations which he would care to see printed within the same covers as my criticism. If he takes me at my word, my readers will know that they have both sides of the question before them. If, however, he declines the challenge, I may here refer by anticipation to two articles in the Church Quarterly for October, 1900, and January, 1901, in which he is proved to have supported his theories on the Old English Bible by mis-statements and omissions only a few degrees less inexplicable than these which I here expose.[1]

Having thus dealt with what are really the Cardinal's most important witnesses, I will review very briefly the abundant evidence which proves that Henry's condemnatory report was substantially correct. I say substantially, because I have little more belief than Cardinal Gasquet in the unsupported evidence of Henry's commissioners. The King found in the monasteries one of the most serious hindrances to his political schemes. He dreaded their power and coveted their money; therefore he appointed commissioners to make out a case against them. In this he simply followed the precedents of medieval justice; for Cardinal Gasquet entirely blinks the fact that Henry was a true child of the Middle Ages. The injustice with which he carried out his designs was incomparably less revolting than that with which a fourteenth century King and Pope suppressed the Order of the Templars. The barefaced dishonesty with which he pocketed the spoils compares favourably, after all, with that of the Popes for a good three centuries before the Reformation. During these three centuries, the Pontiffs had regularly squeezed vast sums out of Europe for the Crusades, and had spent them as regularly on personal wars, personal luxuries, or personal vices. Still, the fact remains that Henry's injustice and cupidity were very great. Cardinal Gasquet easily proves thus much; and, indeed, it had been clearly proved before him.[2] But here, on the very threshold of the real question, nearly all his arguments stop. Yet the real question is far more important than that on which he spends nine-tenths of his arguments. For three centuries and more before the Reformation, public opinion had discussed the merits and demerits of monastic life. Does the public judgment of those three centuries show us a state of things compatible with modern civilization? or does it show us the monks so idle and useless on the average, so depraved in many instances, that few people would wish to see them among us again at this moment, in the same state in which the Dissolution found them? That is the real question, and that is what Cardinal Gasquet has made no serious attempt to answer. He blinks the obvious fact that, from the date at which Dissolution first became a burning political question, evidence on either side must be received with the greatest caution. Nearly all his witnesses are as ex parte and as untrustworthy as the commissioners themselves. An old man (name unknown), who just remembered the Dissolution as a boy—another later and equally anonymous author, many of whose statements are so patently false that I can only wonder how the cardinal dared to print them—these are two of the main pillars of his great fabric.[1] Apart from the registers which he misquotes so incredibly, he makes scarcely any pretence of bringing historical evidence for the condition of the monasteries during the four centuries preceding the Reformation. In his introductory picture, he skips from St. Anselm in the early twelfth century to an anonymous reactionary of the late sixteenth. What theories could not a future historian maintain about the England of 1905 by this simple method of judging it from two documents dating respectively from 1600 and 1950 A.D.!

1. I need hardly say that neither the Cardinal nor any of his supporters have taken me at my word. The Cardinal consoled himself with throwing mud at me in the preface to his next edition, while carefully avoiding every issue of historical fact.

2. Even Fuller and the Whig Burnet, in the seventeenth century, disclose much of the truth; and in modern times the point has been laboured at great length, and with ample evidence, by Blunt, Brewer, and Dixon. A clear and popular abstract of Brewer and Dixon would quite suffice to correct Froude's exaggerations: by taking a line midway between Froude and these critics, we should come very near to the truth.

Moreover, even within the narrow and vicious circle to which he limits his enquiry, he shows strange ideas of evidence. To take a few instances: one of his trump cards is the formal compliment paid to the greater monasteries in the preamble of the bill which dissolved the smaller houses. Has there ever been an age in which a statesman's formal utterances in one year's Parliament could not be turned against him some other year? Again, while justly reprobating the alleged indignities offered to nuns by Henry's commissioners (and this is one of his strongest points, though the assertion rests only on the word of two bitter partisans, of whom one was not even a contemporary), he ignores the fact that the very best of medieval visitors permitted themselves on similar occasions

1. (1) The Rites of Durham is a little book by an anonymous hand, of which the earliest MS. dates from half-a-century after the Suppression. It describes the monastery and church of Durham Cathedral, chiefly from the point of view of a ritualist and antiquary, referring only incidentally to the monks' morals, etc. It remained in MS. during the years when its publication might have provoked flat contradictions from others who also remembered the monastery in their youth; and, when finally unearthed and printed, it was at once attacked, (rightly or wrongly), as apocryphal and legendary. (2) The Cole MS. is equally anonymous and obscure; its author, I believe, does not even pretend to have seen most of what he describes, and tells us definitely that for a knowledge of the monks' morals and usefulness he was dependent on his father's report (II, 321). It was apparently never published, even partially, until Henry and the dispossessed monks had been more than two centuries in their graves. Yet these are documents on which Cardinal Gasquet lays special stress, to the exclusion (as will be seen) of the most definite and irrefragable evidence. Moreover, the author of the latter MS. at once puts himself out of court by asserting that the cottages of England had increased fivefold in the sixty years following the Suppression: a statement which Cardinal Gasquet renders still more absurd by italicizing the word towns and laying stress on it in its modern sense of boroughs and market-towns. To a sixteenth century writer, as to modern villagers, the term town includes even hamlets. On this blunder he founds what, to many readers, would be one of his most telling arguments. It is not enough for him to build upon such worthless hole-and-corner documents; but he must also misread them in order to get the results he needs.

liberties which are absolutely revolting to modern ideas. He accepts, whenever they suit his purpose, statistics which are demonstrably wrong by at least 4,000 per cent. (I 2—II 504). He misapplies to the sixteenth century monks a testimonial which Professor Thorold Rogers does indeed give to those of the thirteenth century, but expressly refuses, on the very same page, to those of Henry VIII's reign in whose favour Cardinal Gasquet quotes them ![1] Again, Cardinal Gasquet imputes the miseries of modern England to the Dissolution, without pausing to consider what was the state of the working-classes in all countries where the monasteries were spared until the French Revolution. He takes care to name religious houses where Nicke's visits give a better result than those of Henry's commissioners, but suppresses the cases in which Nicke corroborates or even outdoes the others in blame. But perhaps his weakest and most dangerous argument, though one of his most frequent, is to emphasize the very grossness of this or that accusation made by the commissioners, and then to work upon the modern sense of decency. "Can you, as English gentlemen, believe this to be true?" To the credit of modern Anglicanism, that has proved one of his most effective arguments, as I know by experience. Yet, however successful such an argument may be with candid modern opponents, it would have been simply laughed out of court in the Middle Ages. Of all these cases which the cardinal seeks to discredit as inherently improbable because they shock nineteenth-century minds, there is not one which cannot be paralleled and outmatched from the most unimpeachable medieval sources. For instance, one of Cardinal Gasquet's strongest points is that so many of the accused monks and nuns were afterwards pensioned. Yet the reader has already seen how Bishop Nicke pensioned the adulterous, thieving, and homicidal prior of Walsingham: how the scandalous abbot of Tavistock was allowed far more for his single pension than all the other monks together received for their needs; and far worse cases might be quoted. A century earlier, Balthasar Cossa, chamberlain to Pope Boniface IX, scandalized even the people of Rome by more shameless immorality than any that Henry's commissioners record; and the Pope found no better remedy than to create him Cardinal and send him as Legate to Bologna. Here he outdid even his previous enormities, and was presently raised to the Papacy. Anyone who has been impressed by Cardinal Gasquet's argument ex incredibili should read the catalogue of the crimes with which he was charged by the Council of Constance.[1] What is more, the cases which Cardinal Gasquet tries to put out of court as too impossible to be believed can all be matched from these very Visitations to which he has appealed as proving the contrary! He finds inherent improbability in the statement that the prior of Crutched Friars was found in gross misconduct at eleven o'clock on a Friday in Lent: yet we find an orthodox and irreproachable visitor accusing a monk of Wendling of adultery "not only in the holy time of Lent, but also in Passion Week."[2] The abbot of Langdon was accused of incontinence and drunkenness to which Cardinal Gasquet objects that "if Layton's accusations were true the abbot could have been got rid of without expense and without the scandal of proposing to place such a man in cure of souls." Yet neither Nicke nor Grandisson, as we have seen, could get rid of worse offenders without expense: and in pleading the improbability of Layton's story, Cardinal Gasquet simply supplies another proof that he does not know his own documents. Again, in the case of the abbot of Wigmore, he claims that "the accusation of murder is absurd on the face of it, and may be dismissed." Yet Nicke's abbot of Walsingham had murdered a peasant: Grandisson's abbot of Tavistock had tried to murder his squire: and the registers give no hint in either case of what we should consider a fit punishment for such an offence. Eudes Rigaud, a far stronger prelate than either, was entirely unable to prevent his subordinate Bishop of Lisieux from giving a canonry in that cathedral to a nephew who was "ill-famed of homicide" (p. 61). Nobody who had really faced the facts of the Middle Ages could appeal to impunity for a proof of innocence, as Cardinal Gasquet more than once does.

1. I will give the quotations here, since they exemplify clearly in a few lines the cardinal's habits of literary dishonesty—it is impossible to use a milder phrase. In a chapter designed to set forth the harm done to England by the Suppression, he writes (II, 496). "In strong contrast with the caricature drawn from the imagination of novelists, who at best clothe the cloistered life with a poetic unreality, the description given of it by a deeply-read writer of modern times may be here quoted. 'The monks,' says Mr. Thorold Rogers, 'were the men of letters in the middle ages, the historians, the jurists, the philosophers, the physicians, the students of nature, the founders of schools, authors of chronicles, teachers of agriculture, fairly indulgent landlords and advocates of genuine (sic) dealing towards the peasantry.'" Here, as often, he gives no reference; but his allusion is evidently to the following passage from Thorold Rogers' "Six Centuries of Work and Wages." (p. 362). "These monasteries were in the zenith of their reputation during the first half of the thirteenth century, when they had, it would appear, been stimulated to a beneficent activity by the rivalry of the two new orders of preaching friars, those of Dominic and Francis. They had, to be sure, the fatal gift of wealth, but they seem to have used their wealth well. They were founders of schools, authors of chronicles, teachers of agriculture, fairly indulgent landlords, and advocates of generous dealing towards the peasantry." But, only eleven lines lower down, Professor Rogers goes on "It is not easy to understand how these monasteries declined in character and usefulness till they came to the condition which is described so indignantly by Gascoigne—a condition which renders probable the charges which Henry the Eighth's commissioners made against them. But many causes appear to have contributed to the result." The italics are mine: the quotation needs no further comment.

Nicke, for instance, found the prior of Eye in 1514 "suspected" with Margery Bery, for whose son he had built a house. In 1520, at the same monastery, Margaret Verre, who may or may not be a different person, "is dwelling with the prior and lives suspiciously." There is no record of punishment in either case. The reader will remember how the Bishop's injunctions for Wymondham, which I italicized, show far more solicitude to avoid scandal outside the monastery than to inflict punishment inside; and we find that even the most energetic and saintly prelates of the Middle Ages left the plainest immoralities unpunished whenever they could thus avoid a public scandal.[3] As a far more accurate scholar than

1. Lea, Celibacy, p. 344. A case even more shocking, perhaps, is to be found lower down on p. 431.

2. Brit. Mus. MS. Add. 4934, p. 82. Cardinal Gasquet is at present editing the register from which Peck made these extracts: I am not aware that he refers to it in his Henry VIII, but it was well-known and easily accessible then.

3. Cf. the following extract from the register of Archbishop Eudes Rigaud, the friend of St. Bonaventura and one of the most determined medieval reformers, whose contemporaries surnamed him "the Pattern of Good Life." He is visiting a Chapter at Pontoise. "Richard de Triguel is accused of sin with a certain prostitute; yet there was no great scandal: we warned him to desist. Again Master Robert is accused with the gardener's daughter, and has but lately had a child by her, but the scandal is not great: we warned him to desist.

Cardinal Gasquet has pointed out, (in speaking of the constant abuses revealed by visitations of the Wells, Ripon, Beverley and Southwell chapters), even the frequency and gravity of the accusations is far less significant than the impunity of admitted guilt. "Next to contumacy," writes Mr. A. F. Leach, "revealing the secrets of the chapter or the Vicar's Hall to the laity seems to have been the most heinous crime. . . . Only two of the innumerable cases are actually suspended for sexual misbehaviour. . . . We can only conclude that neglect of duty and sexual immorality were so common that they were never punished, except when some public scandal was created by them."[1]

That is the real clue to the visitation records which have come down to us. Religious houses had, even at the crown of the Middle Ages, such good reason to dread lay criticism, that nothing might not be pardoned so long as scandal could be avoided. Even St. Bonaventura, and at least one archbishop worthy to be placed by his side in Dante's heaven, felt this as strongly as it was felt by inferior men. For, of all Cardinal Gasquet's mis-statements, perhaps none is so hopelessly inaccurate as his repeated assertion that the Middle Ages did not accuse the monks, and that their evil repute dates from Henry VIII or later. This assertion sums up the whole object of his two bulky volumes, and I must contrast it very briefly with notorious facts.

On the one hand, the ascetic writers assure us emphatically and repeatedly that immorality will ensue in monasteries if the monks cease to work hard, are allowed pocket-money, gad abroad, or eat flesh except with the utmost parsimony. On the other hand, we know that not one only, but all of these relaxations were rather the rule than the exception in the sixteenth century. The desperate efforts made to prevent the monks from possessing private property testify not only to the serious bearing of this point on convent morality, but also to the irresistible growth of luxury and indiscipline. Innocent III, among his other reforms, decreed that the "proprietary" monk or nun should be buried like a dog in a dunghill, as a token of the soul's certain damnation. Torquemada gravely asserted that a Religious committed mortal sin by merely claiming a book as his own, except by a mere slip of the tongue. No clause of the Benedictine Rule was more explicit or hedged round with greater safeguards; yet Dr. Kitchin points out how the Winchester monks had their regular pocket money or private incomes; and to Nicke they clamour again and again for the money which, if he or they had taken the Rule seriously, was the wages of death to their souls. Again, in the matters of labour, of strict attendance at the services, of wandering outside the walls—in all those safeguards of monastic morality, the Rule was equally relaxed. The Carthusians alone (I believe) kept to the original Benedictine Rule about flesh; and they alone have been able to take for their motto with some real truth " Never *re*formed, because never *de*formed." Henry's commissioners, therefore, only professed to find in the monasteries that which monastic disciplinarians had prophesied as certain.

1. Introd. to "Southwell Visitations," (Camden Soc.), pp. 75, 85, 89.

Moreover, he behaves improperly in going barefooted outside his door to a certain workshop where women of ill fame are often congregated: we warned him to desist from such behaviour" (p. 42). This hushing-up spirit is constantly traceable in the visitation records, and damages them very seriously as witnesses for the defence. When the register of one of the strongest prelates in the Middle Ages reads like this, how can we argue from the silence of bishops who scarcely ever lived in their dioceses, or whose own lives were immoral?

Again, medieval literature simply swarms with tales of monastic immoralities—not only or mainly, as Cardinal Gasquet asserts, of a ribald character and imported from the East—but solemnly told in solemn works of theology written by monks or friars. I believe it might be safely asserted that such stories, told to point a moral, in religious books, outnumber those told in jest by medieval satirists. Moreover, very definite and almost unquotable attacks on monastic morality are made in the thirteenth century by Roger Bacon, St. Bonaventura, and his fellow-cardinal Jacques de Vitry; in the 14th by Merswin, Gower, Langland, St. Catharine of Siena, and Wycliffe; and in the fifteenth by Gerson, one of the reputed authors of the Imitation of Christ and the greatest churchman of his age. Of these nine, Wycliffe is far from being the most emphatic. Jacques de Vitry stigmatizes the monks, before the Franciscan reform, as " keeping an outward show of piety but denying its inward virtue . . . disobedient, murmurers, backbiters, bearing Christ's cross unwillingly, unclean and incontinent, walking after the flesh and not after the spirit." Turning to the nuns, he asserts that a girl's virtue was safe among none but those of the Cistercian Rule (Hist. Occ. cc. 4, 15). The learned Gower, who hated Lollardy and chose to spend his last years within the priory of St. Saviour's, Southwark, complained how " in some monasteries " of his time, chastity was dead, and lechery had taken her place; how " very many " monks (plures) went to hell for women, and how nuns were sometimes seduced not only by their confessors but by the very visitors who were supposed to guard them.[1] (Vox Clamantis. IV. 327 ff., 461, 595: an abstract of these complaints may be found in Morley's English Literature, vol. iv, p. 187.) Gerson, among other remarks almost equally strong, says in one place " I actually doubt whether boys and girls do not sometimes learn worse morals . . . at schools and among monks and nuns[2] than they would in brothels." Dr. Lea's Sacerdotal Celibacy swarms with the most damaging quotations from medieval sources, and no Romanist has ever dared to grapple seriously with this book, now nearly forty years old. I recently pointed this out in vague and general terms à propos of a blunder in the Church Times, and appealed for several weeks to readers of that paper and of the Catholic Times to supply me with any contemporary denial of the numerous and definite accusations of medieval writers against monks and nuns. Nobody supplied me with such evidence, and both papers finally salved their consciences by suppressing my later letters. So far as I am aware, the orthodox theologians who undertook to refute Lollards with painful minuteness on other points, never dared to assert that the accusations of widespread monastic immorality were mere slanders. Gascoigne, though Wycliffe was one of his pet abominations, agreed with Wycliffe

1. It is noteworthy that Gascoigne, a contemporary, accuses Archbishop Stafford, while Bishop of Bath and Wells, of having had " sons and daughters " by a nun.

2. In religionum et scholarum contuberniis. Ed. Paris, 1606. II, 628.

in repeatedly describing the monks as idle, uncharitable, and immoral. He looked upon them as a hindrance rather than a help to religious or secular education ; and he echoed with even wearisome iteration Wycliffe's plea for their disendowment. Over and over again he appeals to the Pope and the Lords of the Church to acknowledge that the then state of things was intolerable ; and indeed the final crash was only delayed for eighty years more. The fact is that, not content with misquoting the witnesses he brings forward for his own special plea, Cardinal Gasquet has turned his face steadily away from all that would have thrown real light on his subject. To say nothing of the great Continental visitation records—Eudes Rigaud at Rouen, Busch in North Germany, Ambrose of Camaldoli in North Italy, Ninguarda in Bavaria and Austria—he knows nothing even of English visitations which give the lie to all the main contentions of his book. He knows nothing of Gascoigne, though Prof. Thorold Rogers refers emphatically to him in the very passage from which Cardinal Gasquet has quoted with such signal bad faith. Yet Gascoigne, one of the greatest chancellors Oxford ever had, supplies by himself enough evidence to upset the whole apologetic fabric which Cardinal Gasquet has reared so painfully in two large volumes. Cardinal Gasquet, for instance, pleads that the lack of fifteenth and sixteenth century monastic chronicles points less to the idleness of the monks than to the " probability that many such monastic records were destroyed at the Dissolution " (p. xxx. note). Gascoigne, however, tells us plainly " Formerly the Kings kept, in the monasteries which they had founded, writers of the books of great Doctors and of chronicles which recorded the examples of former kings : but alas ! for now books are rather ruined and lost and corrupted than written afresh among monks ! O then, O that Kings and Lords who have the advowsons of monasteries, moved thereto by good confessors, would enjoin on the abbots and convents to keep continually certain writers of [the works of] holy doctors and men great in science, under certain penalties imposed by the King or by such Lords ! " (p. 73, cf. 112). It is hardly too much to say that every argument of any importance in " Henry VIII and the English Monasteries " is similarly contradicted by the experience of this distinguished scholar, who in 1450 unwillingly prophesied much that was verified at the Reformation. Even if Cardinal Gasquet had not already known that Gascoigne's " Liber Veritatum " was one of the most precious authorities for English life a few generations before the Reformation, Prof. Thorold Rogers' words must have drawn his attention to it. A single glance at the index would have shown that it was full of information about the monasteries ; a couple of days' work, at the most, would have shown that Gascoigne, an eye-witness, gives the lie direct to all these theories of monastic innocence which are, after all, purely modern.

For I beg the reader to note that every word of my criticisms rests upon the statements of orthodox and learned medieval writers, except so far as I quote Wycliffe on points on which he agrees with the rest. From the testimony of these contemporaries, it follows that any attempt to whitewash the monasteries must take account of the following incontestable facts.

(1) Ascetic writers prophesy intolerable abuses if once the Religious get into the habit of neglecting any one of the main outward observances of their Rule. Four of these main outward observances, at least, were habitually neglected long before the Dissolution—monks habitually ate flesh, possessed property, had ceased to labour, and went in and out of their precincts pretty well as they pleased.

(2) Not only satirists and comic writers almost without exception, but noble churchmen from whom the bitter confession was wrung by the necessity for reform, accuse the monasteries of deep unfaithfulness to their religious ideal, and often lay stress on those very immoralities which modern apologists ignorantly attribute to Protestant slanders.

(3) While Lollards and other heretics found one of their strongest arguments in the accusation of immorality, their orthodox opponents, replying point by point to heretical attacks, avoided this particular accusation with the most significant persistence. What is more, from the thirteenth century onwards, great churchmen are themselves found complaining that heretics drew their strongest arguments from the frequent immorality of the clergy.

(4) Although we have no diaries or autobiographies of medieval monastic reformers for England, such as those which throw so lurid a light on French, German and Italian monasticism before and after the Reformation, yet even the scantier English official documents frequently show us scandals which would not be tolerated in modern society.

(5) All the countries which did not suppress their monasteries in the sixteenth century have been obliged to do so since, at one time or another. The state of the French and Italian monasteries just before the Revolution was such as no apologist, so far as I am aware, has seriously attempted to defend.[1]

These, then, are the questions which every champion of monastic purity must set himself to answer before he even begins to consider the evidence of Henry's commissioners. Let us set this evidence altogether aside, for good or for evil. Let us take our stand on the years before Henry's visitation, and look back over the available evidence for the preceding three or four centuries of monasticism. We shall then ask ourselves, Why did the Fathers prophesy monastic immorality ? Why did medieval saints and sinners, orthodox and heretics, complain of monastic immoralities ? Why do the records of Visitors reveal gross offenders enjoying absolute or comparative impunity ? And then (looking forwards over the next few centuries), Why had those monasteries which were spared in the sixteenth century become intolerably corrupt, in the most exclusively Romanist countries, before the end of the eighteenth ? These are points with which, hitherto, Cardinal Gasquet has made no attempt to deal, though they stare the historian in the face. His indiscreet and disingenuous advocacy, though disguised under an appearance of candour and commended by an easy style, can only prejudice his clients in the long run. Not until the original documentary evidence has been sifted and summed up by some first-rate historian—and it is a disgrace to English historical scholarship that this and kindred subjects have not yet found special students, but have been left in the hands of writers whose very profession tempts them to subordinate strict truth to " edification "—only then will educated Englishmen be able to render more enlightened homage to the undoubted virtues of the earlier monks, while clearly distinguishing them from those who formed too large a proportion of the communities suppressed by Henry VIII. Nothing is so wasteful as untruth, even in the holiest of causes : and the rancorous anti-clericalism of modern France, Italy, and Spain, is directly traceable to the incurable propensity of the Romanist clergy, medieval or modern, " to edit history in their own favour," as Dr. Barry puts it with characteristic tenderness.

1. See Dom Paul Denis, "Le Cardinal de Richelieu et la Réforme des Monastères Bénédictins" (Paris, 1913), especially Preface, pp. vii, viii, and pp. 163–212. With this evidence from the early seventeenth century, compare the very rare little book published in 1503 by the Abbot of St. Sulpice at Bourges under the title of "Reformationis Monastice Vindicie" (Paris, Marnet). This booklet, which throws more light upon monastic conditions, perhaps, than any sixteenth-century document of equal compass, is fully summarized, with copious extracts, in my Medieval Studies, No. 11 (Simpkin, Marshall & Co., 2/6 net).

It only remains for me to mention a popular book on " English Monasteries " (reprinted from a series of anonymous articles in the Church Times), which, with much show of evidence from the registers, relies almost wholly on Cardinal Gasquet for its most important statements. I challenged the anonymous author some six months ago to correspond with me publicly on crucial points on which he seemed to mis-state the plain facts. He kept a discreet silence ; but, even now, in case Cardinal Gasquet should decline my offer of eight free pages on this subject, I willingly offer them to the author of " The English Monasteries," without asking him to break his resolution of anonymity. Failing him, I am ready to extend the same hospitality to any writer for the Catholic Truth Society ; any well-known Romanist apologist like Messrs. Wilfrid Ward or W. S. Lilly ; or, indeed, anyone else who can claim to have actually studied the Visitation records.

PS.—As will be seen from pp. 2-9, it is probable that Cardinal Gasquet knew practically nothing of the Exeter Registers beyond the scraps he had read in Oliver. When challenged to produce chapter and verse, he found it safest to fall back on his reputation, leaving the public to take his word against mine for the assertion that the testimony of medieval Visitation Records is favourable to the monasteries. Let me, therefore, cite two independent witnesses, who have written since Cardinal Gasquet's book was published. Sir George Duckett, writing in 1893, summed up his impressions of a series of Cluniac visitations extending from 1269 to 1529, and embracing England, most of Germany, and part of France. (" Visitations and Chapters General of Cluni," p. 331.) His judgment runs : " But who, we may ask, after reading these several Reports and Resolutions, forming an endless list of crimes and misdemeanours, which (be it remembered) were never intended to see the light, can for a single moment wonder at the Reformation, or secession from the Romish Church in 1517, or in any way pretend to deny or palliate the state into which religious foundations had sunk in this and every other country at the time of that event? History has handed down to us their state; the foregoing records go distinctly to prove and verify the same. There are some who pretend to deny both, though after such a tissue of excesses and abominations as the foregoing disclose, reading more like extracts from the Newgate Calendar, what other results could ensue but that Reformation?" The second witness, Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson, has kindly permitted me to quote from his Lincoln Visitations, now ready for the press.[1] It will be seen that he writes less dogmatically: not only that he is a better and more judicious scholar, but his material is considerably smaller than Duckett's, and seems to show less definite evidence of monastic decay. Yet, with every wish to do justice to the monasticism of the fifteenth century, he writes "No one can fail to draw the conclusion that in many houses matters were far from satisfactory. Not merely are there specific instances, as at Eynsham, Godstow, and Markyate, of blots upon the fair fame of a convent; but in four cases (Huntingdon, Caldwell, Daventry and St. Neot's priories) the preamble selected for use by Bishop Gray is a sweeping indictment of a state of utter slackness and degeneracy. Gray's injunctions to Ramsey abbey were accompanied by further sealed injunctions, dealing with faults more serious than he cared to publish; and he also took this course with regard to the dean and chapter of Lincoln. . . . But we may believe that there were monasteries in the diocese, which, under the headship of capable men, were still instant in the observance of their religious duties and needed little correction and few injunctions from the visitor."

I quote these, not to imitate Cardinal Gasquet's habit of deciding medieval questions by appeals to modern authors, but to emphasize the absurdity of his claim to beg the whole question by a single sweeping appeal to the reader's faith or credulity. Modern historical method demands that a writer should produce his documents, or should at least give clear and detailed references.

1. "Introduction to Injunctions, etc., from the Registers of Richard Flemyng and William Gray, bishops of Lincoln, A.D. 1420—A.D. 1436" (Lincoln Record Soc. and Cant. and York Soc.), pp. XI-XIII.

II.[1]

A Revivalist of Six Centuries Ago.

THERE is a charming essay on Religious Revivals in Medieval Italy among the old Cornhill essays of the late J. A. Symonds. He describes in the first place the "Great Alleluia" of 1233, and the marvellous career of John of Vicenza, under whose influence north Italy seemed for a few weeks to have no business but prayer and praise and religious processions. John and his companion friars healed for a time the most inveterate feuds : city after city surrendered to them at discretion, and allowed its statutes to be made or unmade by these wandering preachers. Vivid as is Symonds's description of the Revival, he yet leaves some of the most curious details ungleaned. The Statutes of Parma, for instance, show us the friars cleansing that great cathedral of the corn which, to the scandal of the more devout, was habitually stored in its nave—just as, in the year after Dante's great vision, a Devonshire parson was found using his church as granary and brew-house combined. Again, the Franciscan Salimbene gives us many curious details of the Great Alleluia, which probably determined his own conversion. Sincere believer as he is, he nevertheless describes with great gusto the ingenious bogus miracles which his great friend Brother Gerard of Modena used to concoct in conjunction with John of Vicenza ; and he assures us that many were converted by this means. He also describes how Brother John's head was turned by his success. When the great preacher was shaved during a visit to a Franciscan convent he was naïvely disappointed (it appears) that the Brethren did not pounce on the shavings for relics. Such little touches go to explain John's final fall. He demanded to be created Duke and Count of Vicenza, and used his sudden power so recklessly that he was cast into prison, from which he emerged a discredited and neglected man. For the Great Alleluia had died away as rapidly as it rose ; and within a few months family feuds and civil wars were raging worse than before.

Symonds describes other similar revivals in medieval Italy—half sincere, half theatrical, but always fierce and short-lived. I propose here to speak of a very different mission-preacher of the same age, the greatest perhaps of all the Middle Ages, the German Berthold of Ratisbon. He, too, produced effects difficult to be imagined in these days of widely diffused education ; but in him there was no touch of quackery, and his influence outlasted that of his Italian colleagues. The linden under which he preached at Glatz was still famous in the seventeenth century ; and his sermons, printed in modern German as a book of living theology, are in their third edition.[1] Born in 1220 of an upper-class burgher family at Ratisbon, Berthold joined the Franciscans while still a youth, and was the favourite pupil of David of Augsburg, whose writings have often been attributed to St. Bonaventura. In 1250 he was already a famous preacher ; until his death in 1272 he tramped from town to town, from village to village, like a Wesley or a Whitefield of later days. In this fashion he traversed Bavaria, the Rhineland, Switzerland, Swabia, Austria proper, Moravia, Bohemia, Silesia, Thuringia and Franconia. His fame was great even in Italy, and is enshrined in the early Franciscan chronicles. At this moment, especially, it may well interest a modern reader to get a glimpse of medieval mission-preaching.

1. This paper, from the North American Review, June 7, 1907, is here substituted for my original 2nd Study, which is now incorporated in the second edition of "From St. Francis to Dante."

Of the effect of these sermons we have very marvellous stories, even when due allowance has been made for medieval exaggeration. The best description of him, as we might expect, is to be found in the autobiography of his contemporary Salimbene, who always gives life to whatever he touches :

" All who have heard him say that, from the days of the Apostles even to our own, there was never his like in the German tongue. He was followed by a great multitude of men and women, sometimes to the number of sixty or a hundred thousand ; or, again, the whole populations of more than one city would come together to hear the honeyed and saving words which flowed from his lips. He was wont to ascend a wooden belfry, which he used as a pulpit in country places : and they who set up the structure crowned it with a pennon, that folk might see whither the wind blew, and so seat themselves as to hear most clearly. And, wonderful to relate ! he was heard and understood as well by the most distant as by those who sat by his side ; nor did any rise to depart until he had made an end of his preaching. And when he preached of the tremendous Judgment of God, all would tremble as a rush quivers in the water ; and they would beseech him for God's love to speak no more of that matter ; for it grieved them beyond endurance to hear him. One day, when he was to preach in a certain place, a ploughman besought his master for God's sake to let him go and hear the sermon ; but his lord answered, ' I myself shall go, but thou shalt go plough in the field with the oxen.' So, when the ploughman had set himself to plough in the field at dawn, straightway by a miracle he heard the voice of Brother Berthold preaching, though he was thirty miles distant ; and forthwith he unyoked his oxen and let them feed, and sat down to listen to the sermon. And when the sermon was done he ploughed as much as he was wont to plough with a full day's work."

A precious fragment printed in the appendix to the first volume of the Analecta Franciscana reports a conversation of Berthold with St. Louis and with the King of Navarre. The latter questioned the great preacher about this reported miracle of the ploughman, and Berthold replied :

" Good my lord, believe it not, and give no faith to tales of this kind which men tell of me as though they were miracles. . . . There are certain men who, either for lucre's sake, or for some other vain cause, follow me among the rest of the multitude, and at times invent such tales and tell them to others."

Yet the real wonders he worked led inevitably to such reports. A noble lady had " followed him for six whole years from town to village, with other women that were of her company, yet could never get speech of him in private." At last, when all her money was spent, she was able to see him and tell him of her distress. He sent her to a banker in the town, who would give her (he said) " the money value of one single day of that indulgence for which she had followed Brother Berthold these six years." The banker, contemptuously humouring her fancy, was astonished to find that all his gold was as a mere feather in one scale so long as the lady breathed into the other ; " for the Holy Ghost lent such weight to her breath that no weight of coin could balance that scale." He was converted, as was also a robber-knight so notorious that the burghers of the nearest city had adorned their council-hall with a fresco representing him by anticipation on the gallows.

1. Regensburg, Mainz, 1873.

Berthold, like all mission-preachers, especially in the Middle Ages, appealed most constantly to the simple themes of Heaven and Hell. According to an often-repeated legend, a woman was so overcome by his terrible invectives against her own besetting sin that she gave up the ghost in the middle of his sermon ; but his prayers recalled her to life for just long enough to make her confession and her final peace with God. She told the horror-stricken congregation that, out of 50,000 souls which had departed at the same moment with herself, three only had been worthy even of Purgatory, and one of Heaven ; the remaining 49,996 having gone straight down to hell ! Something of this vivid imagination may be found in Berthold's sermons even after six hundred years. We see him addressing his vast congregations in the open air. At one moment, speaking of the glory of Transubstantiation, he says :

" Grant now that our dear Lady St. Mary, Mother of God, stood here on this fair meadow, while all the Saints and all the Angels found room around her, and that I were found worthy to see this sight. . . . I would rather turn and bow the knee before a priest bearing the Lord's body to the sick, than before our Lady St. Mary and all the Saints of the whole host of heaven."

Again, he answers an objection from his hearers :

" ' Brother Berthold, thou speakest oft and oft of these devils and all their sleights ; yet we never see or hear or touch or feel a single devil.'

" ' Lo, now that is even the worst harm they can do thee : for, hadst thou but once seen a single devil in his true form, I should know for certain that thou wouldst never sin more. . . . If the devil came out at this moment from this forest hard by, and this city that we see before us were a burning fiery furnace heated through and through, then should ye see such a press of folk as never was seen, and such as never shall be seen in this world, and all of them thronging headlong into that burning fiery furnace ! ' "

Berthold's sermons give a gloomy view of society even during the years between St. Francis's death and Dante's boyhood. The Pope could make and unmake emperors ; Cardinals and Bishops were among the greatest princes of the day ; the parish priest had inquisitorial and disciplinary rights over almost every act of his parishioners, yet the people were not only far more ignorant, but had even less of true religion than to-day. " The laity are evil, the religious are evil," is a quotation constantly recurring in Berthold's sermons. He finds himself compelled to advise his hearers on delicate points of spiritual relationship arising from the numbers of " parson's children " who were to be found everywhere. " It often happens," he continues, " that a Bishop has children, few or many " ; yet for two hundred years clerical celibacy had been the strict rule of the Church. He complains that bribery and corruption are as rampant in the spiritual as in the lay courts. In consequence of the depredations of robber-nobles, " in places where there might well be two or three parish priests, there is scarce one ; and even he may well be found unlearned." The pagan superstition still flourished which held it an evil omen to meet a priest the first thing in the morning. Berthold alludes to the constant tithe-quarrels ; as an English bishop of the same date complains that parishioners, indignant that priests should exact tithes even of milk, revenged themselves by bringing their pailful to church and pouring it on the floor before the altar. The priest himself, again, was often excommunicate, and the whole parish involved with him in mortal sin. Nor, with all his nominal authority, could the parson put down the constant habit of Sunday work, or secure regular attendance at church. " Lo, a stinking goat of a Jew has more reverence for his holy days than thou ! " The people's religious education also left much to be desired. " Many rise in the morning without even making the sign of the cross, and very likely reach the age of twenty years without being able to repeat the Lord's Prayer." Many, again, are so ignorant of the creed that they fall a prey to the first doubt suggested by the experience of life : " Ah, God ! who, then, are in the right—Jews, heathens, or heretics ? I know not how things stand, nor who hath the right faith." Of Bible study in the modern sense there was of course no question, nor would it have been permitted even if it had been otherwise possible. The laity are therefore warned against disputing with Jews : " For ye are unlearned, while they are learned in the Scriptures, and they have pondered carefully how they may persuade you ; so that ye will be ever the weaker in faith for that dispute." As St. Louis pleaded in the same century, a layman's only valid argument in such cases was " to thrust his sword into the Jew's belly as far as it would go."

But had not the parish clergy strong auxiliaries in the swarms of friars who filled the land ? The best influence of the friars was fast waning during Berthold's lifetime, though these new Orders were scarcely half a century old. Too often the friar and the parish priest were at daggers drawn ; or heretics carried on their propaganda in the name of St. Francis, just as the first Franciscan missionaries had been taken for wandering heretics. Berthold's constant and impassioned warnings show clearly (if we did not know it from other sources) how little the Roman faith could claim to reign unquestioned even during this its golden age. He reckons the heretical sects of his time at " a good hundred and fifty," and appeals to his hearers' knowledge of " how many thousand men are led astray by unfaith." The process of perversion, as he describes it, is simple. A heretic is never converted ; his heart is turned to stone ; " and just as crystal is petrified water, so are heretics petrified Christians : as little, therefore, as the crystal can ever be turned to water again, so little can a heretic be turned back to Christianity, however fresh and green he may be in his heresy."[1] On the other hand, it is only too easy to make a Catholic into a heretic. The preacher illustrates this through one of his most picturesque, and least accurate, illustrations from natural history. Playing upon the German names for heretic and cat (Ketzer, Katze), he says:

"No household beast can work so great harm in so short a time as this, more especially in summer: let all take good heed of the cat. She goes away and licks a toad, under some hedge or wheresoever she may find it, until the toad begins to bleed; then the poison makes her thirsty, and she comes and drinks at the same water whereat men drink, and defiles it, so that many a man is sick for half a year, or a whole year long, or even to his life's end; or it may be that he takes his sudden death therefrom. Or again the cat drinks so greedily that a drop falls from her eye into the water, or that she sneezes therein: and he who uses that water must taste of bitter death. . . . Wherefore, ye folk, drive her away, for the breath that cometh from her throat is most unsound and perilous: let her be driven forth from the kitchen or from wheresoever ye may be, for she is deadly unclean. And thence also hath the heretic his name of Ketzer, since in all his ways he is like no beast so much as a cat. He goes as demurely (geistlich) to other folk, and speaks as sweetly and can bear himself as softly as any cat; and even so suddenly has he defiled men's bodies. He holds so sweet speech of God and the angels, that thou wouldst swear a thousand oaths that he is an angel himself; yet is he the devil incarnate. And he promises to let thee see an angel, and teach thee to see God with thy bodily eyes: yet he hath swiftly parted thee from thy Christian faith, and thou art lost for evermore. . . . Had I a sister in a country wherein were only one heretic, yet that one heretic would keep me in fear for her, so noisome is he. Therefore let all folk take heed of him. I myself, by God's grace, am as fast rooted in the Christian faith as any Christian man should rightly be; yet, rather than dwell knowingly one brief fortnight in the same house with a heretic, I would dwell a whole year with five hundred devils! What, heretic! art thou by chance in this congregation? I pray to Almighty God that there be none here present!"

These sermons explain, almost more plainly than any other document, the state of mind which drove honest and good Catholics into such wholesale and systematic barbarities as we can scarcely think of without a shudder. If, even in the Age of Faith par excellence, faith was so frail as to be shattered by the least breath, and heresy so strong as to resist all orthodox arguments, then persecution was plainly the only resource of men who denied to the heretic the name of Christian, and looked upon him and his as mere food for hell-fire. Nor does Berthold show us only heresy rampant; he constantly alludes to free-thought also. But for the stern repression of the Jews, he thinks that these might have succeeded in smothering Christianity altogether. Again, men found it hard to understand why Cato should be in hell with Nero: a point which may explain Dante's promotion of the former to Purgatory. Again:

"Many say, 'the man who is used to hell is more at his ease there than anywhere else.' That is a great lie; for man can never be used to hell. . . . Some also say—I have heard it even from learned folk—that our Lord makes for many a man some mansion and comfort in hell, that no pain may torment him. That again is a lie and a heresy. . . . Many again preach openly that, whether a man do well or ill, he will be saved if he be destined to salvation; and, however well he do all through the world, he must go to hell if hell be appointed for him."

1. The contemporary Dominican preacher, Etienne de Bourbon, complains also that heretics too often know their Bible far better than Catholics, and that, while many are perverted from the faith, practically none are ever reconverted. He explains it ingeniously: wine often turns to vinegar, but never vinegar to wine.

This, of course, is the predestinarian fatalism which many modern writers imagine Calvin to have invented, though Joinville and Salimbene show us how common it was among the sceptical upper classes in the thirteenth century in France and Italy. But the most popular arguments of medieval sceptics were drawn from the lives of the clergy :

" Men say . . . ' we see none that work such evil as the parsons, nor that do such injustice, as may be seen daily : pay no heed therefore to what the parsons tell thee.' This is the root of almost all unbelief and heresy."

This brings us back again to the body of nominal believers : yet even here the picture is no brighter. The system of Indulgences was comparatively new, and far as yet from that colossal pardon-traffic which shocked Luther ; yet even Luther scarcely spoke more strongly than Berthold :

" Fie, penny-preacher, murderer of mankind ! . . . Thou promisest so much pardon for a single penny or halfpenny, that many thousands trust thee and dream they have atoned for all their sins with the penny or halfpenny, as thou pratest to them. So they will never repent, but go hence to hell and are lost forever. . . . Thou hast murdered true penitence amongst us ! "

Almost equally fatal was the trust in pilgrimages. Many deliberately ran up a long bill of sins in accordance with the devil's suggestion : " put off (repentance) until thou has gained and laid up money ; and then do penance bravely with a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, or a Lententide in Rome, or a journey to Compostella." Moreover, the pilgrim's extravagance often reduces wife and child to poverty ; though he himself " gorges himself so that he comes back far fatter than he went, and has long tales of all that he saw, which he dins into men's ears during service and sermon-time." For the custom which made " Paul's Walk " into a sort of Piccadilly for our Stuart ancestors was simply the survival of a medieval abuse. St. Bernardino's sermons show us the churches filled with folk who came in and went out when they liked, and scarcely suspended talk and laughter to doff their hoods for a moment at the elevation of the Host. Berthold returns again and again to such irreverences :

" Men talk nowadays in church as if they were at market, each calling across to the other and boasting and telling what he has seen in foreign lands ; so that one man may easily trouble six or ten who would gladly be silent. . . . And ye women ! ye never let your mouths rest from unprofitable babble. One complains to another of her maid-servant, how greedy she is of sleep and how loth to work ; another tells of her husband ; a third of her children, how this one is a weariness, and that other thriveth not. To what devil art thou complaining thus in church ? "

The churchyard was used for fairs and markets, with all their attendant disorders, and for indecent pagan dances that were practised in the Middle Ages on Christian festivals ; Berthold tells us that it deserved no longer its old German name of Friedhof, or Court of Peace. Nor were these dances the most painful relics of paganism. The Mass itself had become a mere pagan incantation, to all practical purposes, for the majority of the laity. Berthold is preaching reverence for the Mass, and one of the congregation expostulates with him :

" But, Brother Berthold, we understand not the Mass, and cannot pray thereat so well as we should, nor feel so great reverence as if we understood it. We understand every word of the sermon, but the Mass we understand not, nor know what is being read or sung ; we cannot comprehend it."

The preacher therefore spends the rest of his sermon in giving a rough explanation of the service. No wonder that the holy wafer, the holy oils, the holy water in the font, needed to be kept under lock and key from the common people, who used them as engines of sorcery :

" Many of the village folk would come to heaven, were it not for their witchcrafts. . . . The woman has spells for getting a husband, spells for her marriage ; spells on this side and on that ; spells before the child is born, before the christening, after the christening ; and all she gains with her spells is that her child fares the worse all its life long. . . . Ye men, it is much marvel that ye lose not your wits for the monstrous witchcrafts that women practise on you ! "

Like all medieval moralists, he is never weary of gibing at women's dress :

" They take a bit of cloth, and twitch it hither and twitch it thither ; they gild it here and there with gold thread, and spend thereon all their time and trouble . . . they will spend a good six months' work on a single veil, which is a sinful great travail. . . . They itch for praise, and to hear men say ' Lord ! how fair ! was ever aught so fair ? ' Yet our Lady was far fairer than thou, but she was humble withal ; so was St. Margaret, and many saints more."

" ' But, Brother Berthold, we do it for the goodman's sake, that he may gaze the less on other women.' "

To which Berthold answers with the pitiless logic of a man and a bachelor. If the goodman be honest, he will care more for your chaste conversation than for your outward adornment ; if he be wanton, all your " crimple-crispings " and " criss-crosses " and gold thread will not avail to fix his wandering eyes. Encouraged by these words of sober reason, a man's voice is raised amid the congregation :

" Alas ! Brother Berthold, . . . I have oftimes besought my wife, first kindly, and then sternly ; but she would never leave her follies. I fear to tear one gewgaw from her lest she go and buy another twice as dear, and so my last loss be worse than the first."

The friar's answer, ungallant as it sounds to modern ears, is the true voice of the thirteenth century, from the king to the beggar, from the moralist to the poet or romancer :

" Come, man, take heart of grace ; art thou not a man, and hast not a sword by thy side ? Wilt thou be lightly overcome by a distaff ? Pluck up thy courage, take heart, and tear the stuff from her head, even though thou tear away a hair or twain therewithal ; and cast all together into the fire ! Do thus not thrice or four times only ; then will she leave her follies. Man should be woman's lord and master."

Berthold has his own definite ideas, too, about children. Why is there such mortality among rich folk's children in especial?

"Because the baby's sister makes him a mess of pap, and coaxes it into him. Now his little belly is soon filled, and the pap begins to bubble out; but she coaxes it in and in. Then comes his aunt, and does the same. Then comes his nurse, and cries, 'Alas, my child has eaten naught this day!' and sets herself to coax the pap in again, as before. Meanwhile the child whimpers and tosses its little limbs."

Don't you know (asks Berthold in another place) how your bodies are made? The stomach hangs in the middle, for all the world like a great caldron; and next it lies the liver, by whose heat the pot is kept boiling. If you fill it too full, what can it do but boil over?—hence come heart-burn, fevers, dropsy, and all the ills that flesh is heir to!

An article like this can give only a slight idea of the wealth which Berthold offers to students of the past. There are few works equally accessible and equally rich in hints for the student of manners. The great Revivalist will not teach us pharisaical content with our own civilization; but he may well cure us of impotent hankerings after a dead past.

III.

Side-Lights on the Franciscans.[1]

TO those who knew and loved St. Francis before M. Sabatier's Life gave such an impulse to Franciscan literature in England, the satisfaction which they feel in the saint's immense popularity is somewhat alloyed by the regret that this literature should run in so narrow a groove. Even in M. Sabatier's book, the light is concentrated too exclusively on the saint and his immediate disciples. We are indeed reminded, here and there, that the ordinary friar of the next generation was already of a very different type ; but the story seldom passes beyond that first small group, and everyone seems to avoid the more complicated and laborious question : " What manner of man was the ordinary friar of the second generation ? " And yet, until this question is at least approximately answered, we cannot really understand certain traits in the Founder's own character. Scientific history can never admit Goethe's poetic plea :

> " Ich brachte reines Feuer vom Altar,
> Was ich entzündet, ist nicht reine Flamme."

It is the sower's business to look well, not only to his seed, but to his soil ; for soil will give the increase only by strict natural law, and a man's disciples are, in a sense, only his own thoughts and deeds writ large.

The medieval reaction of the last seventy years in England is, in many ways, a very curious phenomenon. In spite of the number of fine intellects which have led it, it has been far more a matter of sentiment than of logic. The impression that " they ordered these things better in the Middle Ages " prevails among the clergy in direct proportion to their ignorance of actual medieval life ; while most laymen, bred under the tolerant traditions of ten generations of Protestantism, listen to pleas in favour of the old religion with the same half-contemptuous sympathy which they extend to the monks and nuns expelled from France. The current clerical conception of the Middle Ages is thus rather the product of a negative subtraction from modern life, than of a positive synthesis from medieval facts. It is too often assumed that to repudiate any tenet current among Nonconformists is necessarily to work back towards an older and purer Church ; that, the less we sympathize with Bunyan and Baxter, the closer we must approach to St. Bernard or St. Bonaventura.

I will attempt here to show how mistaken this assumption is, and what true community of spirit may be found between the English Puritans and those friars who are generally assumed to stand at the very opposite religious pole. If I seem here to lay undue emphasis on the weaker side of the Franciscan movement, it is only that it now seems high time to protest against the growth among us of a Franciscan legend as unhealthily one-sided, in its own way, as that Napoleonic legend which renders so many Frenchmen incapable of understanding the real lessons of modern history. The Fioretti, the Three Companions, the Mirror of Perfection, are, in a sense, partisan manifestoes, and give us only one side of the truth. Thomas of Eccleston's idyllic descriptions refer, as he himself plainly tells us, to an earlier, heroic age, which had already passed away before he wrote, though this was only some thirty-five years after the Founder's death. To form an idea of the average friar, we must look wider afield—to the miscellaneous notices brought together in Wadding's collections, to the Chronicle of the Twenty-four Generals, to the Seven Tribulations of Angelo Clareno, to the Chronicle of Salimbene, to the early Constitutions of the Order, and, above all, to the disciplinary writings of St. Bonaventura and his school. The most important of these have been published in a cheap form by the Fathers of Quaracchi, in two volumes which cost about half a crown each.

1. Independent Review, February, 1905.

These little manuals aim at presenting complete codes of conduct for novices and full-fledged friars; and one's first feeling in reading them is one of gloom and depression. We are already far, indeed, from the real freedom of St. Francis—from that sense of open air and sunshine in God's world rather than the Devil's, and from an earth where a man may be cheerful without irreverence to greater realities beyond. The model friar of these books is a slave to the letter of the law in petty things, a man who sees danger and defilement everywhere in the world: in short, a Puritan in the invidious sense of the word. The discipline is the discipline of the quarter-deck: hold your tongue in your senior's presence; avoid addressing him by name if possible, and, in any case, never venture to pronounce the bare name "without the sign of his religious title"; never presume, however well-meaningly, to pat him familiarly on the head or the cheek. Rise up when he comes, and never dare to sit while he stands; put back your cowl when you speak to him; never cross the cloister-garth, while the friars are sitting there, "without due soberness and decency in the disposition of thy limbs and of thy habit." Never "thou" and "thee" the senior Brother, except in places where, by the custom of the country, this constitutes no undue liberty.

But these, however petty and un-Franciscan, are among the least tyrannous of the precepts. The rules for religious deportment, as a whole, smack far less of the Fioretti than of Praise-God Barebones. The general precepts, it is true, merely inculcate an impossible theory of detachment from the world. "Keep thy heart," writes St. Bonaventura, after a passage of great beauty:

> "Keep thy heart with all diligence, and let it be given up to spiritual exercises only; suffer no images of earthly things to leave their impress thereon, that so it may remain a stranger to all things created, and free to devote itself solely to its Creator."

Yet a detail here and there shows what this theory involves in practice: "Avoid all games, especially with the young . . . never speak a word to any man which is not premeditated, ordered, useful, and honest . . . wherever thou mayst be, avoid all women and beardless youths except for reasons of necessity or manifest profit . . . never have any spiritual familiarity with anyone, but behave thyself alike to all, so that none may be able to mark in thee any difference or special love for any: . . . avoid special civilities, friendships, and familiarities." But it is in the more detailed exposition of the same theme by St. Bonaventura's secretary Bernard of Besse, and by David of Augsburg, that Puritanism weighs upon us in all its self-imposed gloom. Every speech and gesture and action must be measured and calculated: no spontaneity, no Nature; for Nature is evil.

"Let not novices be easily moved to laughter," writes Bernard, ... "tittering in general is a great disgrace to the gravity of a Religious. It is utterly despicable for a man of Religion to titter like a boy. No man of Religion should utter laughter with undisciplined lips, but show with a glad face the gladness of his heart."

There is a true ring of St. Francis about this last sentence: but the negative precept far outweighs the positive, as we may read in many other passages, and especially in one which Bernard quotes from his greater namesake:

"Trifles among worldly folk are mere trifles, but in the mouth of a Priest or a Religious they are blasphemies. If they are forced upon us, we must perchance suffer them, but never repeat them. To open thy mouth to such things is unlawful; to accustom it thereto is sacrilegious; it is base to be moved to tittering, and still baser to move another."

It must be noted that even the author of the Mirror of Perfection cannot quote St. Francis's love of cheerfulness without adding, as a warning, that the saint never meant thereby to encourage laughter, which on the contrary he specially abhorred: "for he would that the servant of God should not only not laugh himself, but should not afford to others the least occasion for laughter." That even "we who were with him" could have written these words, shows clearly how rash is the common assumption that the saint's admirable combination of inward fervour and outward gladness was shared by his disciples as a body. Many were fervent in spirit, and many were merry of heart; but the fervent and the merry were soon at daggers drawn within the Order.

It is startling in this context to find an express warning against oaths; but the oath was, in the Middle Ages, as natural a garnish even to the churchman's conversation as it is to the modern soldier's. Not only did Chaucer's Poor Parson incur the suspicion of Lollardy by his protest against profane language; but the same is gravely recorded as a common characteristic of heretics by a thirteenth century inquisitor. Eccleston, in his catalogue of the extraordinary virtues of the early friars in England, thinks it necessary to enumerate that they gave up all oaths in their speech. The novice, therefore, needs the serious reminder that—

"To swear at one time by the Head, at another by the Saints, or in any other fashion, is most unbecoming of a disciple of Christ, Who saith, 'Let your speech be yea, yea ; no, no.' Among servants of God, there should be comparison of opinions ; but no altercation, which is a perverse thing ; especially if the mouth of a Religious be opened with damnable boldness to railing or curses (which, as the Apostle saith, exclude from God's Kingdom) ; or if he take the Devil's name in his speech, or use it often in common talk."

As Joinville remarked in the same generation : " I never heard [St. Louis] name the Devil, whose name is much used throughout the Kingdom, which I believe to be far from agreeable to God."

So far, then, so good ; though we must remember how strongly all this would smack of the precisian to the worldling of those days, and what sad nicknames the French nobles did in fact give to St. Louis for his squeamishness on this and similar points. But readers of the Fioretti will be pained to find, not only that the novice is forbidden to jest, but also that he is exhorted to a truly Quakerish avoidance of civil worldly phrases in his letters and his speech. David would even forbid the conventional How d'ye do ? " wherein is no true care for the health of him to whom they speak." It is true, this may be deduced logically enough from St. Francis's scruples about using the name " Good," and the common titles of " Father " or " Master " ; and yet the saint himself would scarcely have pushed his logic so far. When once such precepts are codified and registered, and imposed upon a whole Order of men, this can only result in a formalism worthy of the seventeenth century precisians. Moreover, the novice is bidden to pay the same minute and painful attention to the matter of speech as to its manner : the " D.V." and the perpetual " edification " of the Clapham sect are also the ideal of the model friar.

" In speaking of doubtful or future matters let them never speak without qualification, but always add some condition to assertions of this kind ; for Religion alloweth not precise words concerning things indifferent. No man living hath it in his choice to say ' Yea ' or ' No ' without qualification, concerning things which are yet mere contingencies. . . . When thou art about to go forth among the public, forearm thyself, and purpose firmly in thy mind to abstain from empty words. Provide thyself, before going forth, with some useful matter wherefrom to weave thy speech if need be."

This, it is true, " condemns idle loquacity, not opportune affability " ; but the line of demarcation depends so much on the individual mind ! Here, for instance, is the talk prescribed to the brethren as they walk two and two :

" At that time they should beguile their toil by recounting examples of the Fathers, or any other good examples, which may either kindle their affections or at least instruct their intellect. It is most disgraceful to be unable to pass the time with any but frivolous and fabulous stories. Woe unto those who are silent of thee, O Lord ; for the loquacious are dumb ! "

Again :

" Let friars beware of carrying news about, even though it be good and probable. It is unbecoming of Religious to be everywhere carriers of news. The falsehood which is very often in the report itself, or which is brought in by secular men who pass it on, is imputed to its first author. . . . Let them be honest and serious in their talk, not showing themselves worldly in worldly words, and such as move to laughter. A servant of God should speak of God, to fulfil the Scripture : ' if any speak, let him speak as it were the speeches of God ' : otherwise vain words disclose the vanity of the mind."

The same formality extended itself to prayers: "never pray without sighs" (or groans). The gift of tears in prayer was a frequent and much coveted sign of grace: he to whom it was not vouchsafed prayed to have it; for, after all, this is a Valley of Tears. St. Louis bitterly regretted that he could so seldom weep in prayer. The Blessed Umiliana, having lost for a while this gift of tears, nearly blinded herself by putting quicklime into her eyes to provoke the accustomed signs of grace. In spite of St. Francis and the Fioretti, "God's Minstrels" are now forbidden even the solace of song.

"Let them not sing on their way, especially to secular airs, even though the words be good; for layfolk understand the bare sound only. And besides this, it befitteth not a Religious to raise his voice above the ordinary."

A vast amount of early Church music was adapted, like the Salvation Army hymns, from secular music; St. Francis once took two lines of a popular song for the text of his sermon; Frate Elia was held to have shown his un-Franciscan spirit by grudging that the saint should sing so loud upon his deathbed. Yet already, in St. Bonaventura's days, the Puritan estimate of song is officially ratified. What a gulf lies between this and the holy freedom of the first days, when a scoffing knight was converted by hearing a friar sing as he trudged with bleeding feet through the snow! But those first friars had been real missionaries. What we find now is an Order, very jealous of its honour, and all the more sensitive to the breath of scandal because its decay in real religion and popularity was already only too notorious.

Meanwhile, the more grievously all weightier matters of the law are omitted, the more punctiliously are the tithes of mint and anise and cummin paid. The smallest gestures are prescribed. "It is unbecoming in an honest and humble Friar to put his leg over his thigh, or to cross his feet in public, as he sits." He must utterly avoid all bodily games, as St. Bonaventura also commanded. For a friar "to take anyone, without necessity, by the hand or the girdle, to carry idly flowers, fruit, or a staff in his hand, or to twirl the end of his girdle round in his fingers, is not in accordance with seemly behaviour; nay, rather, it is to some extent a token of wantonness." "When they go among the laity, let the modesty of discipline shine forth in their words, their walk, and their habit: let them speak briefly and little, let them cover their head decently, and hide their hands [in their sleeves], utterly avoiding to kiss, or touch the bare hand of any woman, however nearly related to them." For it would be difficult to overrate the prudery of the model friar, if prudery that may be called which had so real underlying reason. Again and again, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, we find solemn repetitions of the ancient decrees which, for the avoidance of scandal, forbade a priest to live in the same house even with his mother or his sisters. It was one of the distinctive virtues of St. Louis of Toulouse that, after his conversion, he dared not kiss even his mother. Bernard of Besse specifies this as dangerous, with much more that is almost equally significant. The Blessed Clara of Montefalcone, a sainted Franciscan nun of the same thirteenth century, is commended for having refused to look at her brother unveiled, though he was himself a friar. She would never show an inch of her naked flesh, even to her doctor: and when once, in sleep, she had thrust one bare foot from under her gown, and her sister had told her of the fact, "she expiated it with many tears as a grievous act of impiety." What most distressed her contemporary, the Blessed Umiliana, on her death-bed, was the thought that the crowd which would come to worship her corpse might kiss her naked feet. To avoid this danger, she caused her shoes and stockings to be drawn on while the breath was yet in her body.

Nor was the model Franciscan behind his sisters in these proprieties.

"When the friar washes his feet, he should avoid there, as elsewhere, to show his bare shins; nay, he should, with all the greater diligence, wrap his frock around him: for it is a disgrace for persons of Religion to be seen with naked flesh. Every honest [Religious] is careful that his bare flesh be never seen, save in case of manifest and compelling necessity. We read of St. Antony that, when he needed to ford a river, he begged his fellow to withdraw somewhat from his sight, lest each should see the other's nakedness. His fellow withdrew, yet even then he was ashamed when he would have bared himself. And, as he thus pondered within himself, God's power bore him across to the further bank of the stream: for doubtless this honest thought of his was acceptable to the Lord."

It is told of a Dominican and a Cistercian monastery, and I think also of a Franciscan, that the Blessed Virgin came one night into the dormitory to see whether all was well, and was much shocked and embarrassed to find one friar showing his bare shins. Here again we are already far from the childlike simplicity of the first times. In the Fioretti, the Brethren show no such prudery: Ruffino preaches in a church "naked as he was born, save his drawers only"; and St. Francis joins him in the same condition. Juniper is more unconventional still: for the earlier version of the story expressly denies to him even the one scanty garment which the Fioretti leaves him; and on at least two occasions St. Francis also is recorded to have appeared in public without a single rag of covering. The hair shirt, with which Canon Rawnsley covers him in the Bishop's presence, is a mere piece of later prudery. The first free association of penitents and missioners founded by St. Francis soon became a Religious Order, and must perforce fall in with the old monastic routine, which is admirably illustrated by a story in Caesarius of Heisterbach.

"Ulrich, Abbot of Steinfeld . . . rode abroad one day with one of the youths [who were reared in the monastery]; and, as they talked together, they met a fair maiden. The abbot, of set purpose, reined in his steed and saluted her most ceremoniously: she in her turn stood still, and bent her head to return his salute. When, therefore, they were gone a little further, the abbot, willing to tempt the youth, said: 'Methinks that was a most comely maiden.' 'Believe me,' replied the youth, "she was most comely in my eyes also.' Whereupon the abbot answered 'she hath but one deformity, namely, that she hath but one eye!' 'In truth, Lord,' replied the youth, 'she hath both her eyes; for I looked somewhat narrowly into her face.' 'And I,' said the abbot, moved to indignation, 'will look narrowly into thy bare back. Thou shouldst have been too simple to know whether she was male or female.'"

The threat was publicly and solemnly fulfilled that very evening; and Caesarius presently goes on to extol the exceeding sanctity of a nun who, having lived in the convent from the age of seven years, "scarce knew the difference betwixt a layman and a brute beast." So St. Douceline, one of the most remarkable saints of the thirteenth century, " knew no man by sight " ; though, as a Béguine, she moved amongst her fellow-creatures. When a little girl of seven, who was in her Béguinage, looked at some workmen who were employed on the house, the ascetic saint " beat her most grievously, so that the blood ran down her ribs, telling her meanwhile that she would sacrifice her to God." To the strict Franciscans, the other sex existed only as a temptation, permitted by God's inscrutable providence. All their earliest disciplinary writings take up the theme of the monks, their predecessors : that the secular woman is dangerous indeed, but spiritual friendship is even more perilous than worldly familiarity. David of Augsburg describes in four separate places, with great plainness and detail, from his own wide experience, the gradual development of such familiarities from apparent good to open evil. He asserts that " the reverence for Religion (i.e. for the Franciscan Order) is made vile through such familiarities, and very many evils come to pass." But (as he complains) it is very difficult to avoid evil companionship : there are so many " by whom men are drawn into sin, not only by their example, but even by their persuasion and derision, and ' the sinner is praised in the desires of his soul.' And this evil conformity is now almost the principal cause why evils are so multiplied in the Church, and spiritual studies have failed in Religion, and many have become backsliders to external studies and business. . . . ." There are so many, too, of whom it may be said, after years of religious routine,

" He is drawn away little by little from his first fervour, and his desire of spiritual progress grows languid, and there glide into his heart affections for religious women (or vice versa, of men), and frequentings of such women : and at last, when all else is extinct, nothing is left but this poor solace, that he can still speak of the spirit ; whereby either he sets himself above many who have not felt such spiritual experiences, or he gets for himself a name among religious women, who fancy that he speaks from the abundance of his heart, and is a good instructor in spiritual life and inward devotion. Very many are tossed by this storm of temptation, and few come safely to land."

" Often love, which seemed at first good and spiritual . . . changes to carnal love " : " very many have perished by the sin of lechery." St. Bonaventura constantly harps on the same theme. There is no real safety but in flight. As Bernard of Besse remarks, after his warning against touching the hands of, or kissing, even a baby sister :

" I can call that man neither chaste nor honourable who abhors not to touch a woman or to suffer her touch. How should it be lawful to touch that which it is not lawful even to behold."

No doubt this is to some extent a piece of religious rhetoric ; yet it is impossible to study carefully the records, even of the earliest times, without realizing how fatally the Order was shut out from healthy influence over one half of the world. Even if the Franciscan ideal had been otherwise practicable, it must, sooner or later, have been wrecked on this rock. The friar's reputation was as delicate as that of Caesar's wife ; and the satire of outsiders like Chaucer or Langland is abundantly explained by the painful solicitude of all earnest brethren within the Order.

Meanwhile, however, the vast and unwieldly phalanx was attempting to follow in the footsteps of the most spontaneous and unconventional genius of many ages ; and with the natural result. St. Francis had let the world go by, because he had already in his soul a richer inheritance, the kingdom of God. But, apart from the first band of his personal followers, most friars began at the other end, like most men of any age whose religious feelings have received a sudden and violent stimulus from without. The world seemed to them a positive evil, a Thing to be fought against in much pain of soul and body. In the naïve records of the Mendicant chronicles, we get constant glimpses of a terrible gloom of life. The world was to them, as truly as to Bunyan, a Valley of the Shadow of Death, set off only by the painted mockeries and ghastly gaiety of Vanity Fair. St. Bonaventura names, under breaches of the Seventh Commandment, besides " curious gazing on women," " the curious listening to news, or to musical instruments . . . the sight of fair things, and the contemplation of delectable things with inordinateness of affection." Again, " the desire to see fair things and possess rare things " is, in a nun, " concupiscence of curiosity." The rules drawn up for Franciscan and Dominican Tertiaries—i.e. folk who, without entering the cloister, pledged themselves to lead a religious life in the world under the friars' guidance—forbid attendance at weddings or dances, among other " unhonest " and " worldly " spectacles. It is true, dancing is invariably spoken of as an immoral and dangerous pastime by medieval theologians, and with only too much justification from the manners of the time. The objection to weddings, too, may be partly explained by the not infrequent statutes against the practice of throwing snow, sawdust, and street sweepings on these occasions. But the fact remains, that the strict thirteenth century friar looked with as little favour as Calvin himself upon the ordinary amusements of his time. The Blessed Salomea, sister-in-law to St. Elizabeth, showed her sanctity by keeping away altogether from the festivities of her court.

Moreover, outside the narrow circle of writings immediately inspired by the Founder, there is but little love of nature in early Franciscan literature. Even the not very frequent tales of love for animals are counterbalanced by others of an opposite sort, as of Brother Juniper cutting off the live pig's foot for a sick friend ; of the hawk which God sent to rend sparrows who " presumed " to come into the refectory at Saragossa ; of the flies which Benedict XIII cursed away from the convent of Morella ; and the swallows which Brother Adam drove away from his sermon. The medieval habit of looking for the Devil everywhere in Nature precluded anything like the widespread modern consideration for animals. St. Dominic is related, in the Appendix to Lives of the Brethren, to have deliberately plucked alive a wretched sparrow which disturbed his preaching, and which he therefore imagined to be the Devil, " amid much laughter from the Brothers and Sisters, and awful shrieks of the sparrow." The Marquis de Rambures, in his L'Eglise et la Pitié envers les Animaux, has produced very few examples in favour of his thesis, against the many that could be quoted of medieval indifference to dumb beasts ; and the very tone of his quotation from St. Thomas Aquinas shows what a gulf there was, on this subject, between the general thirteenth century feeling and the modern. It is not surprising, therefore, that the general attitude of the friar towards nature is rather that of the monk, by whom the beauty and variety of the visible world were deemed spiritual hindrances. Life was not worth living, if God had not imposed it on us as the one road to eternal salvation. As St. Bonaventura says: "Why do we desire life to last so long, wherein the longer we live the more we sin? the longer our span, the more numerous our faults! For evil grows daily, and good diminishes." David of Augsburg blames worldly folk for—

"Mourning when their children die, though it is safer they should die after baptism and before they can lose eternal life by mortal sin, than afterwards at a ripe age; for we know not of what sort they will grow up, and manifold are the snares of sin, from which very few escape."

Berthold of Ratisbon, again, complains how life is a prison, but good men—

"Stand ever at the door of their dungeon. As the imprisoned dog ever stands at the door, whining, scratching, travailing to come forth, so stands the righteous ever at the gate of death."

Another fault generally looked upon as specially characteristic of modern Puritanism—the complacent assurance that one's own clique is in the way of salvation, and that all others are on the broad way to damnation—is not only thoroughly medieval, but specially characteristic of those who had taken religious vows. Pious men in the Middle Ages contemplated with the most Calvinistic complacency the hopeless damnation of the whole non-Christian world, including millions of unbaptised infants for whom Christian parents had shed bitter human tears. Jonathan Edwards's sermon on the doom of unbaptised infants, which is often quoted as a typical specimen of Puritanism, is simply a survival of the Middle Ages. St. Bonaventura only voices a medieval tenet, common at least from St. Gregory onwards, when he says that—

"The sight of the pains of the damned heaps up the measure of the accidental joys of the righteous."

In the contemporary Diaeta Salutis, perhaps falsely attributed to him, the author quotes the Psalms to the same effect, describing with merciless glee how the saints at the Last Day, "shall rejoice in the damnation [of the unrighteous] as it is written 'the just shall rejoice when he seeth the revenge: he shall wash his hands in the blood of the sinner.'" His great Dominican contemporaries, Thomas Aquinas, Thomas of Chantimpré, and Humbert de Romans, write to the same effect. Later on, the saintly Gerson, who has often been credited with the Imitation of Christ, speaks with even more ghastly assurance, if possible, on this point. The difficulty is to understand, not how men of these convictions showed such readiness to hew Agag in pieces before the Lord for a question of belief; but rather how they managed so often to rise superior to their creed, and to suffer that men of different opinions should breathe the same air with themselves.

Space fails me for more than a bare enumeration of other equally important points. That "personal assurance of salvation," which to Newman seemed a special characteristic of "the extreme of Calvinism or Methodism," is ubiquitous in Franciscan legends. Again, Bunyan himself never wrestled more bitterly with the problems of predestination than many medieval Religious, to whom Satan would also come as an angel of light, and persuade suicide or homicide as the last stage of religious perfection. No village tabernacle was ever plainer than the first Franciscan churches: St. Bernard insists on the most Quakerish simplicity for his Cistercians, and Gerson feared that the images overdid their purpose of stimulating even the grosser minds of the laity. Many Franciscans believed that the Saint had forbidden church music altogether. The worst Vandalisms of the seventeenth century may be more than matched from the thirteenth and fourteenth; and a long chapter might be written on this one point. Churches were ravaged and ruined wholesale in war; even in peace, corn was found stacked in the Cathedral of Parma, and a Devonshire parson used his nave not only as a barn, but as a brewhouse. Abundant evidence of this kind may be found in Father Denifle's La Désolation des Eglises, and, the visitations of Dean and Chapter churches for St. Paul's, Salisbury, and Exeter. In Italy, tombs were foully desecrated for mere political reasons; and jealous monks not only defaced paintings of St. Francis, but tore down the friars' crucifixes, and cast one at least into a cesspool.

In short, the unlovely features of Puritanism are simply such as have attended most great religious revivals. It would be difficult to name any doctrine or practice distinctively Puritan—as distinguished from those common to all Protestants—for which ample authority may not be found among orthodox medieval churchmen. Much of the odium rightly incurred by the zealots of the seventeenth century is simply due to the fact that they were the first party strong enough to enforce, on an enormous scale, that exaggerated and often repulsive other-worldliness, which had for centuries been the ideal of the hermitage and the cloister.

IV.

The High Ancestry of Puritanism.[1]

THE more generally the history of medieval religion is studied, no longer by one party exclusively, but by men of widely different views and sympathies, the more evident it becomes that the lessons of Church history contain correctives for the one-sided tendencies of all religious denominations. Nothing, for instance, has more hopelessly undermined extreme ritualism than the historical researches of the most learned ritualists, who have discovered that the thirteenth century altar was bare indeed, compared with many which seem quite moderate nowadays ; and that (to quote from one of them) " Some pious usages [of later ritual] flow from very muddy sources." We are here on the outskirts of a truth which only wider study will finally establish, but which is dawning more clearly every day, that the pre-Reformation Church resembled modern English religion, with all its cross-currents and tangle of authority and conflict of sects, far more nearly than either Romanists or " advanced " Anglicans care to realise. A man dissatisfied with the modern world, if suddenly set back into his imaginary paradise of the thirteenth century, would find himself still confronted by a great deal which he specially abhors in modern nonconformity ; and it would, perhaps, grate on him all the more for being then labelled with the label of the Church. Even Baptists and Ritualists are on better terms with each other nowadays than were the parish clergy and the friars of the Middle Ages : and the modern priest, who loses no opportunity of expressing his dislike for Puritanism, little suspects how much Puritanism there was in the highest places during the crowning period of the pre-Reformation Church. St. Bernard, St. Bonaventura, St. Thomas Aquinas go farther sometimes in this direction than a moderate Anglican of to-day would care to follow them : and, in spite of St. Francis's own joy in religion, there is a very strong note of Puritanism among the early friars. Even M. Sabatier, with his admirable historical sense, generalizes too hastily in this respect from St. Francis and the Fioretti to the friars in general. Records older than the Fioretti, and of a more strictly historical character, reveal among the early Franciscans and Dominicans a gloom of life, an exaggerated and stereotyped other-worldliness, an indifference or aversion to some of the noblest things in creation, which we are accustomed to attribute too exclusively to post-Reformation religious movements. The evidence which I am about to quote here is, of course, only a small portion of all that might be brought forward. It is taken from some of the earliest and most authentic Franciscan documents—from the genuine writings of St. Bonaventura and those by his secretary, Bernard of Besse, and his contemporary, David of Augsburg, which have commonly been attributed to the Saint himself—from such early chronicles as Salimbene and " the XXIV Generals," and the similar Dominican " Lives of the Brethren." All these documents, with many more like them, point to the same fact, that much which the modern Anglican brands as distinctively sectarian was thoroughly characteristic of the average friar in the earlier and purer days of the two Orders.

1 Contemporary Review, Aug, 1905.

To Newman, for instance, the " personal assurance of Salvation " was a special characteristic of " the extreme of Calvinism or Methodism." From a purely modern point of view this idea is natural enough : for it is mainly Calvinists and Methodists nowadays who lay stress on that " conversion " of which the other is a natural corollary. But a wider view of religious history sweeps away this narrow limitation : since to the friar also there came a definite moment of " conversion " ; and the friars, too, as Newman would have recognized if their original records had come within his reading, rivalled any Calvinist in the personal assurance of salvation. The ancient " Provinciale," published by Conrad Eubel, which gives a list of the friaries and of their most noteworthy occupants, contains such notices as, " Bro. Andrew earned, while yet he lived, the assurance of the Crown of Life " ; or, " Bro. Rolandino, of Florence, being in prayer, was certified of a Crown laid up for him in heaven " : and more detailed accounts of similar assurances are frequent in the early chronicles. Moreover, every separate Franciscan might boast something of the same certitude ; for the world was never allowed to forget the alleged promise to St. Francis that all who kept his Rule should come to eternal life. If Newman, therefore, could have escaped from his modern world of Calvinism and Methodism back to the Middle Ages, he would have found himself in far closer and more inevitable contact with these self-elected Predestinates, diverting parishioners from his services and offerings from his church ; often preaching doctrines which to him seemed rank heresy ; no longer to be loftily thrust aside as schismatics, but impregnably entrenched behind the special favour of Pope and people.

Nor was this—which I have taken first because of the importance lent to it by such an authority as Newman's—by any means the closest point of contact between modern schism and medieval orthodoxy. Nothing but a close study of the manuals of conduct written for friars by St. Bonaventura and his school can make us realize how little the ordinary conscientious Franciscan retained of St. Francis's joy in life, or in how many respects he was enslaved to a formalism worthy of the post-Reformation Puritan. The discipline of the convent (as I have pointed out elsewhere)[1] was the discipline of the quarterdeck : the rules of conduct were precise and narrow. Laughter and play are absolutely forbidden in these books : beautiful sights and sounds are condemned as savouring of " concupis-cence" ; the formal religious talk and the "D.V." of the Puritan are inculcated ; prayer is to be accompanied by sighs and tears ; dances and public festivities are improper, not only for the professional "Religious," but for all who wish to save their souls. No right-minded friar will gaze upon a woman if he can avoid it ; the very existence of the other sex is a temptation permitted by God in His inscrutable Providence ; upon this theme our friars wax as eloquent as the Wife of Bath's husband. That which to modern ideas is most repulsive in Calvinism—the iron logic with which it condemns so huge a proportion of mankind to eternal pain—is simply inherited from medieval orthodoxy. Even Dante dared not save the unbaptized children of Christian parents from hell ; while Saints Gregory, Bonaventura, and Thomas Aquinas reckon the sight of the wicked in hell-fire to be one of the joys of the blessed in heaven. To the medieval friars, as to the later Puritans, hell was too often a far more vivid reality than heaven ; nor did the elaborate theory of confession and absolution save men from the same blind gropings, the same rash confidence on the one hand or unreasonable despair on the other, which are sometimes spoken of as peculiar to later revivals. David of Augsburg writes of his own time as one might write of the eighteenth century. "Some trust only to God's goodness, dreaming that He will save them even in their sins. . . . And others again have nought but mistrust of God, dreaming that if they are converted, He will not give them perseverance in the spirit or sustentation for their body." It is very remarkable how many medieval saints—and friars at least in proportion to the rest—are recorded to have fought against despair, or against visible devils, on their very death-bed ; St. Catherine of Siena is a typical instance. The devil was everywhere—legions of devils, often in bodily form. The Blessed John of La Vernia fought them with his staff as a man drives away flies ; it was revealed to another of the brethren that "more than 8,000 demons" had been specially deputed to lay siege to a convent manned by only seven friars ! The Fioretti shows us how difficult St. Francis himself found it to expose the wiles of the devil who, in our Lord's shape, had assured the saintly Ruffino that he was destined to damnation. Giles, more saintly if possible than Ruffino, spent long hours of such agony with devils in solitude that "at night, when he went back to his cell, he would say with a sigh, 'Now, I look for my martyrdom.'" Saints of the Middle Ages often tortured themselves as much with mysteries of Predestination as any Calvinist of them all. And it was worse still when Satan came in the shape of our Lord or of the Virgin Mary, with all the glory of heaven around him, and unutterable temptations on his lips. It was thus (we are often told) that he was specially wont to appear to "men of singular perfection and of good progress in religion." In this guise he would persuade the friar, crazed with his own doubts and fears and ecstasies, that the last stage of religious perfection was to be found in suicide or homicide. Such stories are frequent everywhere, and two chroniclers tell us of a friar who crucified himself to consummate his Imitation of Christ. In fact, the more careless was the merriment of the great world, the worse were the struggles of those conscientious religious who retired from it. Behind the bright pageants of the Middle Ages there is a constant undertone of spiritual wailing and gnashing of teeth. Even the tournament, dearest of all to modern romance, was anathema to the religious mind of the thirteenth century.

1. " Side-Lights on the Franciscans."—Independent Review, February, 1905.

But a modern partisan of the Middle Ages might plead, " All this is merely a natural cloud cast upon earnest minds by the rough conditions of life in those days ; this is only one side of Puritanism. You cannot attribute to the Catholic Revivals of the thirteenth century what to my taste is the most hateful feature of the later Puritan. The friars enjoyed all the rich ritual of the Roman Church, and they have left us some of the most splendid churches in Italy. Even if they were Puritan in heart, at least they were Catholic in eye and ear." No, not even so were they Catholic (in the lower sense in which the word is used nowadays even of a pattern in church-tiles), except so far as they were false to their first ideal. The thirteenth century parish church, to begin with, was bare of ornament in comparison with even a moderately " high " Anglican church of the present day. And, beyond this, it is difficult to exaggerate the extent to which religious revivals of the Middle Ages revived also simplicity of worship. The early Cistercian ideal is extraordinarily bare. Mabillon rejects a religious poem often ascribed to St. Bernard " because the Cistercians admitted nothing which was bound by the laws of metre." St. Bernard, in his Epistle to Abbot William, writes of sumptuous churches and their ornaments in words which George Fox might have echoed. The pictures of saints on the walls (as he says) " attracting the worshippers' gaze, hinder their devotions, and almost remind me of the Jewish ritual." In parish churches, this may pass : for the bishops, " unable to excite the devotion of the carnal multitude with spiritual things, do so with material ornaments." But we monks " who have reputed as filth all that shines bright or sounds sweet to the ear, what fruit do we expect from these things ? The admiration of fools, or the offerings of the simple ? or, since we are mingled among the heathen, perchance we have learned their works and even yet serve their idols ? " Nor is such Puritanism confined to monastic churches ; though St. Bernard, as we have seen, would permit pictures and ornaments to the laity who live on a lower religious plane. The saintly Gerson shows plainly that he believed true religion to be imperilled in many ways by the gorgeousness even of the parish churches of his day. " Is it expedient," he asks, " to have so great a variety of images and pictures in our churches, or do they not sometimes pervert many simple folk to idolatry ? " His older contemporary Eustache Deschamps speaks still more plainly to the same effect.

This feeling that the highest religion is least dependent on beautiful sights or sounds was strong among the early friars. They were Puritanical in the plainness of their services. St. Francis expressly forbade the saying of more than one Mass daily in each of their little churches—a prohibition which was neglected almost before his corpse was cold ; for more Masses meant more money, as the parish clergy had long ago discovered. The majority of the first Franciscan settlements had no church at all, no singing, and not always even a separate oratory for the daily offices of the brethren. When the early friars were near a town or a village, they heard Mass singly like other folk, at the parish church. But many of them worshipped in a solitude of contemplation which seldom needed any outward forms whatever. The blessed Conrad of Offida was one of the chiefs of the Spirituals, and is conspicuous in the Fioretti. Yet he confessed that, since he had been made priest and sung Mass for himself, he had lost sadly in spiritual consolation. It was no doubt for the same reason that Brother Thomas the Irishman, one of the special glories of the friary at Aquila, "cut off his thumb, lest he should be compelled to take priest's orders." The stricter of the friars had even a definite dislike for Church music; as we have seen that St. Bernard thought it wrong for a monk to find actual enjoyment in sweet sounds. "If God," writes David of Augsburg, "took delight in the melody of a voice, then should the mere music of instruments or the song of birds charm Him: for these are sweet enough in their own fashion. Purity of heart, and a mind devoted to Him—these are that wherein He delighteth. The servant of God should not care greatly for whatsoever is indifferent to Him." Roger Bacon expresses his disgust at the "curiousness of new harmonies . . . and foolish pleasure in manifold songs," which has invaded the Church music of his day. So widespread was this dislike of elaborate music, or of music at all, that Wadding, in the seventeenth century, feels obliged to argue against certain of the Order who believed St. Francis and his first companions to have forbidden singing and organs in church, and who therefore "utterly forbid" the same in his own day.

The early taste in buildings was equally plain, not to say sordid. A Carthusian of the twelfth century, rebuking his brethren for having borrowed money to build a fine convent instead of the old mud huts, writes, "These beauties and outward elegancies quickly enervate the manly purpose and effeminate the masculine mind. . . . It better befits a mind intent on its inward health, that all without should be rude and neglected." St. Francis, too, loved mud huts, and even wanted to have the new stone buildings at Bologna and Assisi pulled down. The few friars' churches built at this time, as we know from Angelo Clareno, were extremely small and plain. "Our small churches will preach," said St. Francis, "and men will be more edified by these things than by words." The church at Cambridge, as described by Eccleston, would have been almost too miserable for a village meeting-house in our day. The building of fine churches coincides exactly, not only in time but in logic, with the persecution of those brethren who clung strictly to the primitive Franciscan rule. The splendid Basilica at Assisi, with its frescoes by Giotto, was almost as definitely contrary to the teaching and example of St. Francis as was the Golden Calf to that of Moses. Thomas of Celano relates how an otherwise excellent friar was damned everlastingly for his share in the construction of these glorious buildings; Eccleston is not certain whether any were absolutely damned, but he knows by revelation that many expiated it bitterly in purgatory. Some of the dearest friends of St. Francis were imprisoned for their vehement protest against these and other violations of the rule: one of them, Cæsarius of Speyer, was killed by his gaoler. Such buildings as Sta. Croce at Florence were a terrible scandal to the Spirituals, and St. Bonaventura finds in them one of the main symptoms of spiritual decay. A vain attempt was made to check these " excesses " at the General Chapter of Narbonne (1260), where it was decreed that the churches must be as small, as plain, and as cheaply furnished as possible. Not only were bell-towers forbidden, but even stained glass, except that the east window might have figures of our Lord, the Virgin, St. Francis, and St. Antony of Padua. Yet even this was a falling away from the first ideal : for Eccleston tells us how the visitor of the English provinces (about 1230) " took very stringent measures concerning the [painted] windows in the chapel of the Gloucester convent ; and deprived a friar of his habit by reason of a pulpit which he had painted ; the same punishment was inflicted on the guardian of the convent for having suffered such paintings."

Even the iconoclasm of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries finds its worthy counterpart in the thirteenth and fourteenth. Salimbene describes how medieval boys, like their modern successors, threw stones at priceless sculptures and frescoes ; and how a whole town, in a fit of passion, would subject its artistic glories to the basest mutilations and defilements. Not only theologians, but men of genius like Ruskin and William Morris have helped to spread false ideas on this point. No more systematic destruction of ancient buildings was ever carried out than in medieval Rome ; and all careful students of Gothic architecture know that the builder of the Middle Ages was pitiless to any older work which stood in his way. The pious and learned Johann Busch describes with unholy glee, among his other " reforms " in a conventual church, the " conveyance " of an effigy which had long graced the tomb of a mere ordinarily holy bishop, in order that it might be placed over the bones of a sainted predecessor who had lain three hundred years under a plain stone. Nor were even the church buildings and furniture so much respected in the thirteenth century as in our own. The " Mirror of Perfection " tells us how sordid they often were in St. Francis's day, and what pains he took to sweep them. Here, again, is Brother Salimbene's description of the Italian churches even after seventy or eighty years of Franciscan influence. " I have found priests who . . . when the people communicate, thrust the consecrated hosts which remain over into clefts of the wall : though these are the very Body of our Lord. And many other foul things they do, and horrible to be told, which I pass over for brevity's sake. They keep their missals, corporals, and church ornaments in an indecent state—coarse, black and stained ; tiny chalices of tarnished pewter, rough country wine or vinegar for the Mass. The hosts they consecrate are so little as scarce to be seen betwixt their fingers ; not circular, but square, and all filthy with the excrements of flies. Many women have better shoe-bands than the cincture, stole and maniple of many priests, as I have seen with mine own eyes. One day when a Franciscan friar had to celebrate mass in a certain priest's church on a feast day, he had no stole but the girdle of the priest's concubine, with the bunch of keys attached ; and when the friar (whom I knew personally) turned round to say Dominus vobiscum, the people heard the jingling of the keys" (p. 215). This is no exaggeration, for we have the surest documentary evidence to the same effect. Eudes Rigaud, the great Archbishop of Rouen under St. Louis, orders church windows to be walled up for economy's sake, in as matter-of-fact a way as if he had been a churchwarden of the eighteenth century. Surviving surveys of churches, appropriated to the deans and chapters of Exeter, Salisbury and St. Paul's respectively, show that our English sanctuaries in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were often scandalously neglected. The worst part of these dioceses was naturally Cornwall, where the visitation of 1331 shows the following results from the sixteen churches or chapels. At one only "all is in a good state, as it seems, for the present." In three the chancel is more or less ruinous; in eleven the church books and furniture are in a scandalously bad state; in three others "there are practically none of the necessaries for divine service." It is only fair to add that one of these cases was due to a recent sacrilegious robbery. At St. Marychurch, in 1301, the parson was found stacking his corn and brewing his beer in the nave of his church, and we find similar corn-stacks in the cathedral of Parma about 1240 A.D. Again, the wholesale vandalism which came in the train of medieval wars can scarcely be realized now. Not only were churches constantly pillaged and destroyed by either party, but they were regularly used as fortresses, in spite of repeated prohibitions. Here they were exposed not only to the ordinary fate of a besieged or captured stronghold, but also to the most reckless treatment from a dissolute garrison, including nameless desecrations which their worst enemies would not impute to the Puritans of the seventeenth century. Details which cannot be quoted here may be found in Sacchetti's Sermons, No. VII. The Hundred Years' War was a disciplined and orderly affair compared with those of Italy and the South of France during the thirteenth century; yet those who would realize how much beautiful architecture perished long before the Reformation should read the terrible array of fourteenth and fifteenth century documents published by Fr. Denifle, sub-librarian to the Vatican, under the title of La Désolation des Eglises, etc. Nor was that spirit wanting which thinks to do God service by destroying objects of art which the veneration of one party has rendered odious to their religious adversaries. There was at first a good deal of disbelief in the stigmata of St. Francis. Religious rivals who envied the popularity accruing to the Order from this miracle, (unique then, though it has become common enough since), were wont to disfigure the paintings in which the saint's stigmata were shown. Again, certain Cluniac monks of the diocese of Agen, enraged with the friars for settling there, broke through the roof and doors of the church during service time, and pillaged the furniture and books; Wadding records several cases of the same kind. Next to the Holy Wafer, no material object was so profoundly revered in the Middle Ages as the Crucifix. Yet the Cluniacs who tried to drive the friars from Charlieu did not hesitate to break their crosses; and the Bishop of Piacenza, for a like reason, caused a Franciscan wayside crucifix to be torn up by his clergy and thrown into a cesspool. The lamentable iconoclasm of our reformers was simply a survival from earlier and still more barbarous times; an old leaven of malice working under specially favourable conditions.

St. Francis was too beautiful a character to be tainted by the worst faults of his age, and a few of his best disciples kept the true spirit of their master. But the vast majority soon became either men of the world or Puritan ascetics of almost the old pre-Franciscan type. It is painful to note how soon they slid into much of that "holy selfishness" (sancta rusticitas) which they themselves so condemned in the older Orders. The blessed Angela of Foligno is singled out for our special admiration in Canon Knox-Little's St. Francis. She was the spiritual instructress of Ubertino da Casale, whom Dante names as the typical spiritual of his day. She was suddenly converted by the preaching of a friar, and "within a few days she profited so rapidly in the school of Christ that she loved nought but Him, and all became vile dross to her in comparison of Him alone. She mourned to be held by obedience to her husband, by reverence for her mother, and by the care of her children, for she would fain have devoted herself wholly to Christ, on Whose love she desired to spend all her care. She besought the Lord with frequent prayers that He would deign to remove all hindrances, both within and without, that her soul might be wholly set on cultivating virtue and on contemplating the mysteries of Heaven; and so it befel that, within a brief space, her mother first, then her husband, and presently all her children passed away from this world." The real significance of a story like this lies less in the facts themselves than in the naïve admiration with which they were passed from mouth to mouth among the Franciscans, the official solemnity with which they were recorded for posterity, and the gravity with which they are reproduced, even in the middle of the seventeenth century, by so sober a scholar as Wadding. The pages of Franciscan and Dominican chronicles simply teem with indications that both Orders were still deeply tinged with the old selfish idea of life as a sort of jostle for salvation, a religious sauve qui peut. "Be not much disquieted about studying for others' profit," says Brother Giles in the Fioretti (pt. v, c. 12), "but ever study and be anxious about thyself, and do those things which are profitable to thyself . . . for it is not credible that thou shouldest love others' souls more than thine own." (cf. ibid., pt. 1, c. 42, 45; and v. 5, and contrast with Romans ix, 3). The extreme Spirituals, as Angelo Clareno shows us again and again, were scandalized and not edified by the extent to which their brother friars mixed among their fellow men. Even Berthold of Ratisbon, perhaps the greatest popular preacher of the Middle Ages, is not wholly free from this sancta rusticitas; nor even Berthold's master, David of Augsburg, who deplores the loss of spiritual fervour which comes from frequent intercourse with the laity; and who writes in another place: "Beware lest thou regard or scrutinize curiously other men's persons, faces, dispositions, dress, gestures, deeds, words or duties. So far as it pertaineth not to thee to scrutinize these things for the sake of [spiritual profit], pass them by and think no more thereon than if they were sheep or other beasts; let them claim no more either of thine eyes or of thine heart." Who could imagine, from a study of the Fioretti and kindred records, that such words had been written by one of St. Francis's sincerest followers, and passed down semi-officially to posterity among the works ascribed to St. Bonaventura !

Perhaps the foregoing considerations may give serious thought to those who are apt to look upon Puritanism as an invention of the sixteenth century, and to discredit modern religious revivals by comparison with the romantic friar of the Fioretti. That charming idyll no more represents the real bitterness of the war against the world in the thirteenth century, than Lucy Hutchinson's memoirs show us the bitterness of the seventeenth century Leveller. A closer study of the real thirteenth century would not be comforting to the well-meaning men who are dissatisfied with their own generation mainly because it is their own. Puritanism, indeed, is not of one time, but of most times, and especially of most religious revivals. Its faults are simply the faults of exaggeration, an exaggerated belief in the value of religious phrases and religious deportment, with an exaggerated depreciation of " the world," in that narrow sense which was of hoary antiquity before the sixteenth century was born. Revivals are nothing if not in earnest ; yet the word earnest itself has gradually acquired an invidious meaning, so impossible is it to avoid exaggeration, and to fight (where there is no doubt that one must fight somehow) with a pleasant smile on one's face. The Puritanism of the Reformation was simply the strictest and most logical attempt yet made to realize certain thoroughly medieval ideals ; its theory had long been the theory of the religious, but none had yet dared to enforce it wholesale. Charles I, as we know, lost his head simply by trying to realize the ideals which his father had held with equal conviction though with less courage. So the pursuit of an exaggerated and impossible otherworldliness, with all its natural fruits of frequent formality and hypocrisy, has damaged for ever the reputation of that religious revival which for the first time found itself strong enough to force time-honoured ideas for a brief moment upon an unwilling nation.

V.

Romanism and Morals.[1]

"NEVER was there so great a show of wisdom, nor such restless and world-wide activity in so many branches of study, as in the last forty years . . . yet never did such ignorance and error reign as now. . . . For more sins sway the world in these days than in any previous age; and sin is incompatible with true learning. . . . Therefore, since men's lives contradict the laws of Wisdom, they cannot possibly understand Her, even though they roll pompous phrases in their mouths, like boys gabbling their Psalms by rote, or like clerks and country priests repeating the Church services—of which they understand little or nothing—after the fashion of brute beasts."

The first sentences, a reader might say, are from Dr. Barry's indictment of this agnostic century in a recent number of The National Review; the last words are the words of Mr. Kensit. Yet in fact the whole quotation is from one of the greatest philosophers of the Ages of Faith, and one of the greatest Englishmen of all times: Roger Bacon. It may be found (with much more to the same purpose) in the beginning of his Compendium of the Study of Philosophy, dedicated about 1271 to the reigning Pope. The "forty years" refer, as he expressly tells us, to the Franciscan and Dominican reform; yet, after a generation of that reform, the boasted learning of the thirteenth century was, in Bacon's judgment, rotten to the core. Moreover, he traces its rottenness directly to the wickedness of the age, and asserts that his fellow students were as definitely inferior to the pagan philosophers in morals as they were in true learning, in spite of the help which professing Christians ought to have found in God's grace, through baptism and Holy Communion. Nor does he stop short at generalities, but enters into details about professors of Divinity and students at Paris which show a state of things far worse than anything alleged in Dr. Barry's indictment, though it can be proved to the hilt from other sources. Not only does this contemporary of St. Thomas Aquinas condemn en bloc the learning of his own age, but he criticises St. Thomas himself in words which might have been echoed, rightly or wrongly, by Dr. Barry's bête noire, Huxley. The Thomist system, he says, is a magnificent building to the eye; but it rests upon a Bible misunderstood, an Aristotle misunderstood, and omits altogether two of the corner-stones of true philosophy—the mathematical and the physical sciences.

1. Independent Review, August, 1905.

How, in the face of these facts, can Dr. Barry write as he does? The question is best answered by another. How, in the face of the notorious immorality of pagan times, could Bacon put ancient morals far higher than those of the Golden Age of Catholicism? The cause in both cases lies in ignorance of past history. In Bacon's days, the real knowledge of antiquity was impossible; and Bacon could no more have constructed a true picture of the age of Socrates than he could have turned out a modern locomotive. In our age, sufficient materials for reconstructing thirteenth century life are indeed to hand; but Dr. Barry has not cared to use them. He has chosen to write as an impassioned advocate rather than as a sober student, even though he claims, "with past history open before me," to date his article from "the Palace of Truth." And his logic is as false as his history. If, (as he argues), the moral decay with which he charges our age is due to a waning belief in dogma, then the whole history of European morals since the thirteenth century should show a steady downward progression. Dr. Barry knows very well that this is not so; for he has written otherwise in his Papal Monarchy. After a survey of thirteenth century corruptions, which, however imperfect, still shows that he realizes the civilization of that age to have been lower than our own, he adds: "We can neither conceive nor imagine such a time; therefore we shall do well to refrain from judging it." He does not, however, refrain from judging very mercilessly the age in which God has cast our own lot; and I claim the right of speaking here as plainly about the "Age of Faith," as Dr. Barry has spoken about the "Age of Agnosticism." For if, during the six hundred years in which the civilized world has adopted an increasingly critical attitude, first towards the Romanist creed, and finally towards all creeds that would confine human enquiry within too narrow dogmatic limits—if, during those six hundred years, morality has not actually gone far backwards, then it is evident at once that something halts in Dr. Barry's theory. If, on the other hand, with all our faults, we stand as high above thirteenth century morality as that age, with all its faults, stood above the ages of Socrates or Marcus Antoninus, then we shall only wonder how a professed student of history can claim historical authority for so strangely unhistorical a theory. As a special student for many years of thirteenth century life, I know how far even the most plain-spoken historians are from telling the naked truth, which I will try to lay very briefly here before the reader. If Dr. Barry believes me to be exaggerating, and will stake his authority on that belief, I will gladly print and publish at my own expense anything which he chooses to write in answer to this article, only allowing myself as many pages of rejoinder as he takes for his reply.

Roger Bacon, though living in the main current of the new reforms, looks upon his own age as utterly degenerate. He hopes—with a hope that is nine-tenths despair—for some Deus ex machina, for a Good Pope or a Good Emperor, to reverse the worldly policy of his predecessors. Failing that, he sees no hope but in Christ's sudden coming, to judge a world already brimful of iniquity. He lays special stress on the prevalence of the sins of the flesh. Like all other moralists of his time, he names the clergy as the fountain-head of evil. " Everywhere we shall find boundless corruption ; and first of all in the Head. . . . Let us consider the Religious Orders ; I exclude none from what I say. See how far they are fallen, one and all, from their right state ; and the new Orders [of Friars] are already horribly decayed from their first dignity. The whole clergy is intent upon pride, lechery, and avarice." The same testimony is borne by some of his most distinguished contemporaries. The great Franciscan teacher Adam Marsh is never weary of alluding to " these most damnable times," " these days of uttermost perdition," in which all but the spiritually blind " see plainly that Satan is either already loosed or soon to be loosed." Grosseteste, perhaps the greatest of our medieval bishops, complained before the Pope at Lyons that even the small fraction of professedly orthodox Christians was " almost wholly separated from Christ, and incorporate with the Devil through the seven deadly sins." St. Francis, at the very end of his life, spoke of " these times of superabundant malice and iniquity " ; and his earliest biographer, Thomas of Celano, complained that the overwhelming majority of thirteenth century Italians " had nothing but the mere name of Christians to boast themselves with." The same despairing cry is echoed by St. Bonaventura, Vincent of Beauvais, Humbert de Romans, Gerard de Frachet, Thomas de Chantimpré, Raimondo da Vigna—to name none but distinguished friars who knew intimately the first few generations of Franciscan and Dominican influence. " The Church," wrote Gerson prophetically on the eve of the Reformation, " is more morally degraded than was the Synagogue at the moment when it was about to be swept away " ; " it is consumed by an incurable cancer, and the very remedies do but make it more sick."

" But," it may be said, " these may be only the rhetorical exaggerations of well-meaning men who were carried away by the vehemence of their indignation at certain abuses going on under their own eyes. How utterly false would be an idea of our age gathered by some future historian simply from Dr. Barry's article and other obiter dicta of the same kind."

First, then, I would point out, that all my quotations are from standard books of European reputation in their time, which have been thought worthy of print whole centuries after their authors' death ; while some have the authority of Roger Bacon, Bonaventura, and St. Francis—names that will be great as long as the world lasts. Secondly, the authors whom I quote had no quarrel, as Dr. Barry has, with the principles of their time ; they wrote as professing Roman Catholics to professing Roman Catholics, and therefore lacked the most powerful of all temptations to darken the picture. Thirdly, their judgments are abundantly borne out by contemporary evidence.

" First of all, we shall find corruption in the Head." The Popes of the thirteenth century were, on the whole, the best the Church had had for five hundred years, or was to have for three hundred years to come. Dr. Barry was wise to end his own popular history of the Papal Monarchy prematurely at the close of the thirteenth century ; he would have found it difficult to continue it up to the Reformation. Yet the personal purity of at least three Popes of the thirteenth century was seriously doubted by their contemporaries; and Popes lie in Dante's Hell like sheep. The Papal court was then, as always until recent times, a notorious den of corruption. As one of the few really good cardinals complained, it had turned the city of Lyons into one huge brothel during its few years of residence there; and the same evil reputation was enjoyed by Avignon, Constance, and Rome, during other periods of Papal residence. The other prelates were just as bad. Gregory X complained, in 1274, that "they were the ruin of Christendom"; and only by exerting the whole weight of his authority at a great General Council did he succeed at last in deposing Henry of Liège, whose episcopal career of nearly thirty years would be incredible, but for the number of parallel instances that might be quoted. Two abbesses and a nun were among his concubines; and he boasted of having had fourteen children in twenty-two months. Yet he was bishop by the special grace of Pope Innocent IV. The inferior clergy followed suit. St. Bonaventura complains of their ignorance, their immorality, and the dangers of the confessional, in language which would be treated as bigoted in a modern Protestant's mouth. Salimbene relates that he has "a hundred times" heard Italian parish clergy quoting, as a text from St. Paul's Epistles, the maxim: "If not chastely, at least cautiously," to justify their immorality. English cathedrals were partly built out of the fines of incontinent priests. The contemporary register of Eudes Rigaud of Rouen shows that about 18 per cent. of the parish clergy in his diocese were known to him by name as black sheep; yet only here and there could he get rid of the worst offenders. Similar registers bear out the bitter complaints of clerical ignorance formulated by Bacon, Bonaventura, Aquinas, and many others. In 1222, the curates-in-charge of five out of seventeen Salisbury Dean-and-Chapter livings were found, on examination, quite unable to construe a single sentence of the Mass service which they had mumbled daily for years. Rigaud's register gives us the results of similar examinations of priests in Normandy. Gerson, again, represents the Church as crying aloud to the Pope: "Whom wilt thou give, out of the whole body of the priesthood, who is not ignorant of Christ's law?" "Ignorance of God," writes Dr. Barry very truly, "lies at the root of social anarchy." That is why the Reformation was attended with so much lawlessness, and the French Revolution with still more. If the masses are not taught the real Duties of Man, they will inevitably misbehave when they tardily inherit the Rights of Man.

For the masses of the thirteenth century stood, as they stand in all ages, below the clergy. Thousands did not know even the Lord's Prayer; thousands were never confirmed, though throughout England the population did not average five hundred souls to a parish—the population of an ordinary modern village. The very few who could read were generally discouraged from reading the Bible or similarly "high and sacred" books—Cardinal Gasquet's specious arguments notwithstanding. The failure of the Crusades was followed by a general outburst of infidelity. Salimbene tells us how men would refuse charity to the friars, and give instead to some common tramp, crying: "Take this, in Mahomet's name, for he is mightier than Christ now-a-days." With all the priest's inquisitorial and disciplinary rights over his flock, he could not get his parishioners to attend at more than a fraction of the Sunday Mass, or to behave with ordinary decency in church during even those brief minutes. We have the most varied and curious evidence to this effect. Dr. Barry speaks of the confusion of modern sects. Is he unaware that the thirteenth century bred many that were far more absurd and more indecent than those of the present age? Does he not know how often even the orthodox were tortured with deadly doubts, and how (by the confession of contemporaries), in proportion to their longing for God's presence they were haunted by visions of the Devil? Suicide, the one crime of violence which was rarer then than now, was yet far more common in monasteries and convents, where crazy fanatics were often persuaded that this, or homicide, represented the last phase of Religious Perfection.

For it must be understood that even the slight tendency of certain crimes to increase in recent years leaves us still out of all proportion better than our ancestors of six hundred years ago. I will review briefly all the crimes of which Dr. Barry complains. By two independent calculations, from coroners' rolls of Oxford and Bedfordshire, I get at the same result—that the percentage of murders and homicides to the total population of those days was more than twenty times greater than at present. With rape, the disproportion is greater still; for it was a habitual practice in warfare, and when was Europe without war? Even nowadays it is in Romanist countries that gambling is especially rampant; in the Middle Ages it was far worse, and rendered even chess a disreputable game. St. Bernardino complains of the horrible blasphemies and mutilations of saints' images to which the gambling mania led—far worse than anything known to modern Protestantism. Drunkenness, even without the worst modern temptation of distilled liquors, was also rampant in the past; at Oxford, as Dr. Rashdall points out, it was not even an offence recognized by the University authorities. As to obscenity, I dare not even summarise the testimony of Thomas of Celano and Gerson, which points to something far beyond modern France and Italy. The life of St. Catherine of Siena shows us an extreme licence of manners in ordinary middle-class circles. There are few books of medieval history or fiction, even including the collections of anecdotes for preachers' use, which could conveniently be published in an unexpurgated translation. Many songs and parodies written by medieval clerics, and preserved to modern times in monastic or cathedral libraries, are far too licentious to be translated and published in any modern community. The beautiful poem from which Neale took Jerusalem the Golden is in many parts quite untranslatable. It is very strange that Dr. Barry, a professed medievalist, should not have at least some inkling of these things; and that he should not know how little the thirteenth century can be spoken of as a time of pure and ideal family life, untainted by divorce, though space fails me to grapple here with a subject which is complicated by medieval legal fictions.

But (argues Dr. Barry) crime has only "changed its character from violence to cunning, and robs where it used to commit murder." Even that would be something ; for presumably Dr. Barry would readily hand over his purse in response to a serious request for his money or his life. But the change is not such as he describes ; the standard of commercial morality has in fact risen as much as that of general morality. His own Papal Monarchy shows that he is aware how scandalously and constantly the medieval Popes embezzled for private purposes the vast sums yearly collected from the faithful of Europe for the Crusades. Swindlers not only wore the Papal tiara in the thirteenth century, but also lived very comfortably everywhere ; since the Press was non-existent, and the judge who refused a bribe was extolled as a miracle of perfection. Study the story of any religious house of which a full chronicle survives ; the chances are that you will find very frequent indications of waste and embezzlement. Preachers and moralists complained, with wearisome and ineffectual iteration, that " in these evil times " a tradesman must cheat or starve. What is more, the pious theft was as definitely encouraged by high medieval moralists as the pious fraud. Dr. Barry himself has written of the latter, with a touch of his usual tenderness for the past : " to manipulate ancient writings, to edit history in one's own favour, did not appear criminal if the end were otherwise just and good." Salimbene and Cardinal Jacques de Vitry both describe the concoction of successful bogus miracles with no less gusto than real miracles ; and St. Francis himself began his apostolic career with a pious theft.[1]

Throughout the course of history, no country in which Roman dogmas have been accepted can compare in general morality with the modern Protestant States ; and I feel sure that Dr. Barry himself knows this too well to risk the comparison of original authorities to which I challenge him.

On one point, however, I am glad to agree with Dr. Barry. Neo-Malthusianism is comparatively modern as a general practice. It is gaining ground alarmingly in most civilized countries ; and I heartily endorse his plea that it is contrary both to natural and to Christian morality. It is a difficult subject to discuss in these pages, though here again I am quite ready to join issue with Dr. Barry on neutral ground, and to show by contemporary evidence that no Romanist can afford to throw stones at modern society on this account. I will only point out here, that his indictment is one-sided, since it does not sufficiently allow for the temptations created by the diffusion of medical knowledge and mechanical inventions, just as he fails to allow for the temptations to drunkenness created by the cheapness of spirits. Six hundred years ago, when even educated men imagined the stomach to be a cauldron in which the food was cooked by the heat of the adjacent liver, Neo-Malthusianism was primitive in its methods, and by no means unknown (as I will show Dr. Barry, if he cares to ask publicly for the evidence) to convents. Moreover, in an age when war and rapine, famine and plague, thinned off the population far more effectually than any modern practices—when the population of Europe was scarcely one-tenth of the present—a large family was an obvious source of strength ; and restriction would have been sheer lunacy, from the most selfish point of view. The very virtues of modern times—our comparative peace, the cleanliness which kills disease germs instead of allowing them to decimate us, our better medical knowledge—have thus created new temptations. All such fresh temptations are merely God's ways of proving and improving the human race. Those who cannot resist alcohol die out, first individually, and then in their descendants. So also with those who cannot resist Neo-Malthusianism. For Dr. Barry has entirely ignored the one reassuring side of the problem : that medicine is beginning to preach against the practice as emphatically as theology. The habits of which he complains began in, and have spread to us from, France and Italy. But in France and Italy, as I know from having seen them, cheap medical books have for years been sold broadcast, which preach plainly, not the altruistic " you are ruining the race," but the more direct " Neo-Malthusianism ruins your own health." We have therefore here only the same story as with alcohol—first, rapid diffusion and great abuse, then a gradual return to the normal state of things, as a later generation learns by experience, locates the enemy clearly, and is armed to fight against it. The human race will always leave the bones of its fallen along its track through the wilderness ; but it will always march on, in spite of reactionary cries.

1. So at least all the earliest accounts imply most definitely ; and the first to deny it, so far as I know, is Wadding, more than four centuries after the event. Moreover, even Wadding argues that the theft (if theft there had been) would have been justified by the Saint's piety. Canon Knox-Little is characteristically inaccurate in sneering at this accusation of theft as modern ; it is only the unqualified horror of it that is modern.

For Dr. Barry's article is hopelessly reactionary. He must know very well that, six hundred years ago, his own modern Romanism would on many points have left him open to the Inquisitor's dismal condemnation : " Recant—or the stake ! " Possibly, however, he does not know that, in that same age, some of St. Thomas Aquinas's characteristic propositions were as publicly and solemnly condemned as Darwin's and Huxley's in ours. In his sneer at the New Decalogue, Dr. Barry shows utter blindness to the entirely modern virtue of toleration, under shelter of which he is able to cry aloud among Protestants, to get full credit from both sides for his real good intentions, and to influence public opinion so far as his assertions will bear the light of criticism. He is equally blind to the true significance of the modern faith, not only broader but deeper than that of Aquinas, which looks upon Romanism as only one of the best among many creeds, to each of which the wise man must render its due share of respect. He frankly confesses his own inability to conceive a religion gradually transcending dogma, just as the Chaldean who was accustomed to worship God only in His wonderful stars sneered at the Hebrew fools who believed in an invisible Jehovah ; or as the Jew, with his ancient Temple and its splendid ritual, sneered at the publicans and sinners who risked a new religious venture in memory of a crucified carpenter. He laments a dead and buried world, as the reactionaries of St. Augustine's time lamented a dying Paganism, and exalted purely transitory symptoms of history into proofs that Christianity was leading the world to its ruin. Meanwhile, the future belongs, not indeed to the dummy agnostic whom Dr. Barry sets up to knock down again, but to the steadily growing majority of thoughtful men who claim the Pauline right of proving all things, and holding fast that which is good. Such men cling to all that is best in the past, as St. Augustine clung to his Virgil and Plato ; but they look forward to a far more exceeding weight of glory in the future. For their faces are turned resolutely away from the old Egyptian bondage ; and, through all failures and punishments for failure, through fears without and fightings within, they have a steady vision of the City of God.

VI.

The Truth about the Monasteries.[1]

IN this Review for December, 1905, I brought very plain accusations of historical misrepresentation against a number of the best-known Roman Catholic controversialists in England, laying special stress on Cardinal Gasquet's treatment of the monastic question. I offered to print replies from these gentlemen at my own expense: while the columns of the Contemporary stood open, of course, to any counter article: but they have all declined these opportunities. I have indeed received uncomplimentary halfpenny postcards from two of the gentlemen named; and a third person, writing from Gibraltar and omitting to pay the postage, has sent me an anonymous letter beginning "Who the d——l are you?" and continuing in the same strain. In addition to this, Mgr. Vaughan and Canon Courtenay have attacked me in the columns of the Romanist Tablet, but with gross misstatements which I had no difficulty in exposing: Father Gerard has again attacked me semi-officially in the same paper, showing again an ignorance of German, and a readiness to make any assertion which suited his momentary controversial purpose, beyond what I had before suspected in him. Indeed, it is not so much their original inaccuracy which marks off certain Romanist controversialists from most other men of equal education and social standing, as their attitude in the face of unwelcome evidence.[2] The Editor of the Catholic Times (though I am glad to say I did him wrong in accusing him of a third suppression) is still impenitent in the face of an arithmetical blunder which an intelligent schoolboy would have realised long ago; and he can still see no harm in those cooked statistics of Mgr. Vaughan's which, three years ago, filled a more plain-spoken Roman Catholic with "shame and indignation."

It seems worth while, therefore, to supplement my former article by laying before the public a few facts about the monasteries during the last three centuries before the Reformation. This is the more necessary, as I altogether despair now of bringing the Cardinal to an open comparison between the statements for which (while refusing references) he asks the public to trust his unsupported word, and those contrary statements for

1. Contemporary Review. April, 1906.

2. I hope soon to reprint my Tablet letters for the eyes of a wider public. Father Gerard declines to allow me to publish his replies. [This pamphlet is now out of print; but, as Father Gerard consistently refused to meet me on the ground of historical documents, there was no reason for including it in these Studies.]

which I have already given many references, and am ready to give very many more. He evidently realises that it is safer to suffer any exposures from outside than to expose himself by an attempt to answer them. After all, a commercial bankrupt can live very comfortably on the jointure of his wife ; and a controversial bankrupt (as I pointed out in my former article) lives in equal comfort with a powerful and united religious denomination at his back. Moreover, Cardinal Gasquet has at present more encouragement than this : for the lamentable lack of original research in England, of which Professor Firth recently complained, has enabled his theories to gain considerable currency even in what ought to be the most trustworthy quarters. The Athenæum, with its just and world-wide reputation for learned impartiality, has more than once served as a stalking-horse to some reviewer who champions monastic innocence, but from whom I have tried in vain, through the Editor, to extract a bare reference which would enable me to verify such evidence as he claims to have found in a certain MS. at Canterbury. The Church Times, again, published recently a lengthy series of anonymous articles, since reprinted in full under the title of " The English Monasteries," and in part (strange to say !) as a Catholic Truth Society pamphlet ; but still anonymously. For this modern theory of monastic innocence runs in curious underground channels ! In the first of the Church Times articles the author boasts with no uncertain voice of his intimate acquaintance with out-of-the-way medieval documents : yet a sudden fit of modesty restrains him from signing his articles, and from permitting the publisher to reveal the authorship of his book. Stranger still, he allows one of his chapters to be used in aid of the Roman Catholic propaganda ; and the Catholic Truth Society, while introducing him to its readers as an ornament of the Anglican Church and of the Society of Antiquaries, still omits to mention his name ! Moreover, this Great Unknown fully shares the abhorrence of Cardinal Gasquet and of the Athenæum reviewer for definite references. Whether on his own ground of the Church Times or elsewhere, he has consistently declined to produce his vouchers or to face open criticism ; and the Editor has backed him up by suppressing the two brief letters in which I exposed his worst misstatements.[1] Meanwhile the book is of course assiduously puffed, and the author's claims to special accuracy are swallowed by those who have no means of checking his statements and are too candid to suspect his tortuous proceedings. What, however, will probably for a few months add still more to the popularity of Cardinal Gasquet's theory is that it has been recently embodied in a novel. Mgr. Benson's " The King's Achievement " is simply a romantic paraphrase of the already too romantic " Henry VIII and the English Monasteries." Newspaper reviewers, who of course are not obliged to be historical students, have hailed Mgr. Benson as a serious

1. I had already had a similar experience with the Church Times. Having published a gross mis-statement of Lord Halifax with regard to confession, the editor suppressed the second and more conclusive of two brief letters in which I pointed out its glaring inconsistency with known facts. I have heard this policy of suppression deliberately defended by counter-accusations against other religious papers : if it be indeed true that religion has so baneful an effect on journalism, this of itself would go far to explain that decay of clerical prestige which the Church Times so frequently bemoans.

student of history: though in fact he has taken all his points blindly and uncritically at second hand. This is the more disappointing as Mgr. Benson is evidently a real novelist, and might perhaps have become a real historian if he had spent some years in the study of actual historical documents. As it is, he has simply placed modern English characters upon a stage, and among scenery, bearing the merest superficial resemblance to the England of Henry VIII. One or two of his figures are charming, though even these plainly owe a great deal to Scott, Thackeray, George Eliot and a whole body of wholesome modern romance, of which it would be vain to seek the counterpart in pre-Reformation times. Whatever Mgr. Benson learnt from childhood upwards in the home of a distinguished Anglican divine—whatever pure and noble ideas he has imbibed during his honourable career in this England where the clergy have lived in temperance and chastity for three hundred years, and where the laity in turn have gradually risen superior to their grosser vices of the past[1]—all these things he puts into the characters he loves, making them move like gracious figures of the present amid the coarse society of three hundred and fifty years ago. He betrays scarcely an inkling of what Tudor manners were even at their best: the Paston Letters and the writings of his own Sir Thomas More (to go no further) give the lie to half the implications in his novel. Beatrice Atherton runs about alone, at her own pleasure, like any modern American or English girl; one almost sees her drive off tandem, and turns to find her card on the hall-table with Sesame Club in the corner. The book swarms with anachronisms, all the more glaring for the cheap profusion of carved oak and stained glass and Wardour Street accessories with which Mgr. Benson loads his stage. Yet one feels that it would have been an excellent novel if he had dealt frankly with the thoughts and feelings of modern Roman Catholics, and left the Monasteries alone.

There have of course been many admirable monks and nuns in all ages: but even as early as the thirteenth century there were many others who chose monastic life from motives of selfishness and idleness; and the majority took their colour from these last rather than from the first. The evidence of monastic decay, long before the Reformation, is simply embarrassing in its mass and variety. It will be convenient therefore if I follow Mgr. Benson's lead, and confine myself mainly to those which he singles out for our admiration—the Sussex houses and the Cluniac Order, in contrast to the villainy of Cromwell's Commissioners. I must, however, again warn my readers that I hold no brief for Cromwell or his royal master.[2] They carried out brutally, recklessly, and often dishonestly, a clearance for which even orthodox Catholics had long since clamoured in England. Already in Piers Plowman (1370) the monasteries

1. The thirteenth century visitations of Rouen diocese show us that the Archbishop knew 18 per cent. of the parishes in his diocese to possess an unchaste priest; though legal difficulties, and the worse problem of finding better substitutes, compelled him to leave all but a few in their cures. In Italy, as St. Bonaventura assures us, things were worse. An English visitation of 1499 shows fourteen priests of notorious unchastity in ten deaneries (or scarcely more than half the county) of Norfolk. Many of these were very gross cases indeed, yet none of the culprits were ejected. Sir Thomas More, even in the stress of his argument against Tyndall, admitted that clerical unchastity was rife in Wales.

2. Cf. The Monastic Legend, p 10.

are spoken of as deeply decayed and as wasting their great revenues: and the author breaks out into a remarkable prophecy of their future disendowment by the king. Gascoigne, the great Chancellor of Oxford (1450), complains even more frequently of monastic uselessness and waste, and pleads even more strongly for disendowment. Wycliffe, of course, had said the same: but I quote these two authors because they were bitter enemies of Wycliffe and the Lollards. Gower, who also hated Wycliffe, complains of monastic immoralities even more strongly than the Reformer himself. No more glaringly false historical statement has ever been made than the assertion that the evil repute of the monks dates from Henry VIII's time. Saints and sinners (as I have shown by evidence which has not been questioned) agreed in complaining of the monks' idleness, extravagance, and immorality: and, so far as I am aware, even the most determined medieval apologists never venture on a serious defence against these charges. That paradox has been reserved for our own days, now that three hundred years of clerical decency have taught even Protestants to stagger at the sordid facts of the Middle Ages, and to admit apologetic arguments which no medieval theologian ever dreamed of pleading.[1]

Respectable English folk, therefore, had long been accustomed to serious accusations against monks and nuns at the time when Cromwell and his agents began to visit. The brutality of those agents is in many cases indefensible; but Mgr. Benson has been very badly misled on many points. First, he represents the plunder of the religious houses as having been begun by Cromwell. On the contrary, the story of the monasteries, as told by the monks themselves, is frequently a wearisome story of embezzlement and robbery from generation to generation. I will illustrate this here from the real history of Mgr. Benson's own Sussex houses and the Cluniacs. The great priory of Lewes, the most important of all the English Cluniac houses, was almost always in debt, in spite of its rich revenues.[2] From 1259 to 1317, for which years we have frequent data, the records show us a state of things almost incredible, if it were not borne out by other Cluniac records and by the financial details of the Norman monasteries in the thirteenth century. In 1259 Lewes had raised money illegally by pledging three dependent priories, two of which were now falling into ruins. In 1279 it owed £33,000 in money, with a very considerable deficit in farm stock; and the visitors report, "At best it will take upwards of twenty years to liquidate its debts." In 1280 they make a general report that the majority of Cluniac houses in England "are much decayed, both spiritually and financially"—as indeed the details show. In 1290, again, "almost all houses are ill-managed both spiritually and temporally, and are heavily in debt." In 1291 "many properties have been alienated to outsiders"; the priory

1. Here and elsewhere, in arguing from the absence of evidence, I speak of course subject to correction. I only claim to have sought honestly for such evidence, but hitherto in vain.

2. Even at the Dissolution, after more than three centuries of mismanagement, its twenty-six monks enjoyed a net corporate revenue of £9,200 a year in modern currency. Here, and all through this article, I change medieval figures roughly into modern values, multiplying by fifteen in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and by ten in the fifteenth and sixteenth.

" is so heavily in debt that there is no hope of its future recovery, unless remedy be quickly applied " : and a similar report is given two years later, when one of its dependent churches is reported as " on the verge of ruin." Next year the prior has paid off only £500 of the debt : then follow a series of gaps in the visitations owing to the French wars. In 1299 the debts are " very great, and of uncertain extent ; wherefore the monastic hospitality and alms have been much diminished, and there are fewer monks than usual." In 1301 the debt has risen (unless there is a scribe's error) to £220,000 ! In 1306 there were only thirty-three monks : whereas it was asserted that there had once been sixty. In 1314 the debt had fallen again to £30,000. In 1317 it was reported as still very heavy : " every effort must be made to diminish it." Presently came the Hundred Years' War, and the end of English Cluniac visitations. But a document which has survived by chance lifts the veil for one moment about 1330, and shows us a disputed election in the Priory, during which one of the parties sacked the refectory, carrying off the great gilt cup bequeathed by Prior Foville, with so many other valuables that Lewes was obliged to beg contributions from all its sister-houses in England to make good this deficit. In 1331, a petition to the king stated that the English Cluniacs had fallen to a third of their original numbers,[1] that they patched up their financial mismanagement by a system of bribery, and that for want of proper visitation " the order of Cluny is come to shame, and none dare speak of religion "—i.e. of the proper regular discipline. Lastly, in 1489, Pope Innocent VIII issued a bull which shows that matters had naturally gone from bad to worse : though here the evils specially complained of are deeper seated than mere mismanagement of revenues.

Take Rusper nunnery, again, of which Mgr. Benson draws so touching a picture, and to which he sends his hero's sister as a nun. It is the subject of only five recorded episcopal visits. Yet in 1442 the bishop found that the prioress never accounted for the moneys which passed through her hands, although successive Popes since 1228 had specially insisted upon this obvious safeguard of honesty. In 1478 the equally necessary inventory of the convent goods was equally non-existent. In 1521 " the house was in great decay," and much " burdened with expenses by reason of the prioress's friends and relations who constantly stayed there." In 1527 the house was again " somewhat ruinous " ; and, instead of the pretty picture of the inmates given us by Mgr. Benson, plain history shows that the dilapidated convent was inhabited only by a prioress and two nuns. It will be noticed that only one of the five visits failed to reveal carelessness or dishonesty, and such other materials as we have for tracing the revenues of this nunnery from 1291 to the Dissolution show them in a state of steady decay. Rusper, however, was orderly compared with the neighbouring nunnery of Easebourne, to which, we take it, the sister of Mgr. Benson's hero might just as well have happened to go. Here again the finances show a steady decline during the last two and a half centuries before the Dissolution. We have the details of six visitations. In 1441 the bishop found that the prioress's extravagance had run the house into debt to the amount of about £400. She was constantly out of her convent, feasted sumptuously wherever she went, and wore a mantle of which the fur trimmings were valued at £50. She " sweated " the nuns, and gave them no money for their work.[1] The bishop therefore took the financial management of the house into his own hands : yet, even so, the debt increased within the next eight years from £400 to £650, while the net income had now sunk to £225 a year. In 1478, it was discovered that the prioress had pledged convent valuables to the extent of £150 for a very disgraceful purpose. In 1485 and 1489 the house was reported to be miserably poor, though it now supported only five nuns instead of ten. In 1521 the cloisters were out of repair, and the prioress never accounted for the revenues : nor had she done so even at the next visit (1524) : moreover, it was now discovered that convent goods had again been secretly alienated, under circumstances as disgraceful as in 1478.[2] Mgr. Benson takes us, again, to Durford, where he claims special pity for the monks. They were indeed in Cromwell's time " far in debt and great decay " : but the nine inmates then enjoyed an income of £980 ; and, though the abbey had suffered two hundred years before from the ravages of war, the scanty notices we possess point here also to mismanagement as the main cause of their ruin.

1. This, like nearly all medieval figures of the kind, is no doubt an exaggeration ; two-thirds would perhaps be a nearer estimate.

The rest of the Sussex evidence I must sum up very briefly. In 1518 the bishop pointed out that six different priories " had suffered great loss and diminished rents " through want of proper custody for the common seal—or, in plain words, through embezzlement : and they are warned also to discontinue the practice of feeding their hunting dogs on the broken victuals which should go to the poor. In 1478 the monks of Mitchelham were found to have sold the convent jewels to pay for a lawsuit against other monks ; the two priory mills were in ruins ; the prior had presented his accounts only once in twenty-eight years ; had sold books, papers, horses and timber for his own profit, and had embezzled certain sums left for the benefit of the donors' souls. At Sele in 1441 the prior was not accustomed to present his accounts, and had " wasted and consumed the goods of the house." His successor, during fourteen years of office, " devoured " (i.e. made away with) " 11 sheep, 26 draught oxen, 80 young wether beasts, 80 swine . . . 2 mazers (valuable cups) bound with silver uncovered, together with many salt-cellars, chalices, and cruets of silver, granges full of corn, the household furniture, carts, etc. : besides running the house into debt for more than £2,000 and reducing the income to £80 a year." His successor distinguished himself by forging the convent seal and thus alienating some of the endowments to his own profit. The next prior obtained his office by a bribe of £100, and for eight years " wasted the property of the house and allowed the buildings to fall into decay." A dispute over the ownership of the priory lands may palliate, though scarcely excuse, the conduct of these last two priors. The priory of Pynham was sequestrated in 1441 by the Bishop until it should free itself from debt. In 1478 its revenues were much diminished, and its buildings, vestments and books utterly dilapidated. In the same year Tortington Priory was also very ruinous. In 1527 other dilapidations of the property had taken place. At Hardham in 1478 the buildings were very ruinous, the prior had rendered no account for more than four years, and the jewels and plate were said to be in the hands of a neighbouring rector. At Warbleton in 1441 the prior was negligent, extravagant, and remiss in rendering accounts: in 1473 one of the monks was accused of having embezzled two gold cups and played fast and loose with the common seal: the buildings were ruinous, and the inmates reduced from five to two. At Boxgrove in 1518 the prior rendered no accounts. The costly jewels given by Rufus to Battle Abbey disappeared within about twenty years, many of them " either lost or fraudulently stolen." The number of the monks there had fallen, between 1100 and 1530, from sixty to seventeen. These seventeen monks, who even then enjoyed a revenue of £8,800 net, had allowed their library, one of the finest in the kingdom, to fall into a miserable state.

1. As a matter of fact, the nuns were forbidden to receive such private moneys, on peril of their souls ; and the mere fact of their making this complaint to the bishop speaks volumes for the degradation of the Benedictine rule.

2. This is not the place to enter into the moral details of the visitations, but any reader who verifies these references in Vol. IX of the Sussex Archæological Collections, will understand why the medieval nuns were often spoken of by their contemporaries in language which fair-minded Protestants would hesitate to use nowadays.

This then is what can be gleaned from even such extremely fragmentary records as have survived. There were altogether twenty-two houses of monks and nuns in Sussex[1]; the foregoing details give us a glimpse of the commercial morality which reigned in twelve of them. I have been obliged to treat this matter at some length, since there is no other way of expressing the cumulative force of the evidence, and of enabling the reader to judge how far Mgr. Benson is justified in representing Cromwell and his agents as the only spoilers of monastic goods. Exaggerated as is the novelist's description of the cartloads of jewels carried to London, there can be no doubt that the Cromwellian visitors did abstract many valuables: but it is equally certain that what was lost in this way bore a very small proportion to the sums wasted and embezzled by the Religious themselves.

But Mgr. Benson misrepresents far more cruelly the measures taken by Cromwell to keep the monks within due bounds. The accusation originated (I believe) with Blunt, who was not bound to know better. It comes fairly naturally, again, from the pen of Mgr. Benson, who is accustomed to the freedom enjoyed by modern English monks, and often sees them wander almost as much abroad as though they had never taken the vows. But Cardinal Gasquet, as the Head of the English Benedictines, might at least have remembered Clause LXVI of that Rule which even the simplest monk is bound to know almost by heart. The latter part of this clause runs: " The monastery, if possible, should be so constructed that all necessary works . . . may be done inside the monastery, that the monks be not compelled to wander outside, which is altogether unprofitable to their souls. Moreover, we will that this rule be often read aloud in the congregation, in order that no monk may excuse himself on the score of ignorance." Poor St. Benedict! Little did he dream that one of his most honoured sons would one day impute to an enemy, as an unpardonable sin, the strict enforcement of this never-to-be ignored clause![1] No incident could better illustrate the fatal dangers of arguing, as so many do, from modern Romanism to the Middle Ages. This clause, of which Cardinal Gasquet seems to know not even the first word, was treated by medieval commentators with all the respect due to its strict wording. Some (e.g. St. Gregory) would even forbid the abbots and priors to take business journeys, except on rare occasions. Another would refuse to allow any but the maturest and soberest monks to go out, even to visit a dying parent! The Commentators enforce these prohibitions with such explicit warnings, and such plain-spoken citations of Dinah and other Scriptural instances, as leave no possible doubt of their meaning. Yet the monastic vagabondage which so scandalised the laity in Chaucer's time was already rife even in the golden thirteenth century. The Cluniac visitors complain of it bitterly, and an Archbishop of York would not even permit healthy field-labour to some monks because it implied occasions of sin. After reading Chaucer's Shipman's Tale side by side with Martene's commentary on Clause LXVI, one might well wonder whether historical misrepresentation ever went further than this modern complaint against Cromwell for enforcing upon the monks one of the most emphatic and necessary provisions of their rule! The fact that he was able to count with certainty upon their disobedience on this point is adequate proof (if such were needed) of their degradation in Henry VIII's reign.

1. This is a very liberal estimate, including four or five houses which had probably practically disappeared some time before the Reformation.

Space fails me to deal with other gross historical errors in Mgr. Benson's work, and these pages are not the place for a full discussion of the darkest side of monastic life. The whole book is (as I have said above) a string of twentieth century notions thinly veneered with medievalism. His description of life at Lewes Priory is taken (apparently at second hand) from the Rule and the Consuetudines, which is very much as if future historians should try to reconstitute modern English barrack life solely from the Army Regulations and the handbooks of martial law. He knows nothing of the remarkable thirteen century "Dialogue between a Cistercian and a Cluniac," which shows the deep decay of strict observance even two hundred and fifty years before the Dissolution. Moreover, even the fragmentary records of the English Cluniacs, though they give us demonstrably only an extremely small fraction of the actual facts—probably not one-tenth or even one-twentieth[2]—are enough to scatter his pious fictions to the blast. Our most direct evidence covers a period

1. Henry VIII and the English Monasteries, 1. 256, 264.

2. The estimate of the exact value of the evidence is too complicated to attempt here: I hope to deal with it soon in detail. But I have long been trying in vain to induce monastic apologists to discuss it with me. [The subject is partly dealt with in my article in the English Historical Review for January, 1914, on "The Interpretation of Visitation Documents."] of eighty-seven years, from a chance mention by Matthew Paris in 1248 to an equally chance record in Bishop Grandisson's Register of 1334. The period covered by these years is one of the most favourable that could possibly be chosen by a defender of monastic morality, since on the one hand the Franciscan reform was still a reality, while on the other the worst decay had not yet set in. The period ends (1) before the Black Death, which is asserted by apologists to have shaken the monastic system so badly, and (2) at the very beginning of that long Cluniac anarchy which was brought on by the French wars—an anarchy which finally provoked the censures and interference of Pope Innocent VIII. The statistics which I am about to give are therefore extraordinarily favourable for Mgr. Benson, since they represent a time when Cluniac discipline was notoriously far purer than in Henry VIII's reign. The monks who were visited during this period from 1248 to 1334 numbered, at an extreme estimate, 446, or not one-eighth of the monks and nuns at present in the United Kingdom. If therefore we multiply the offences proved against them by eight, in order to bring them into terms of the monks and nuns at this present moment among us, these Cluniac records would give us 152 unchaste inmates, mostly priors of monasteries; forty murderers who together had been concerned in the death of sixteen victims and had slain eight of them within the very walls of the church; twenty-four forgers; sixteen convicted of openly embezzling public moneys, besides countless other less flagrant dishonesties; eight drunken and irreligious priors; sixteen monks imprisoned by the town authorities for other offences; eight who had mutilated monastic servants; eight outlawed ruffians lying in wait on the highways to slay their religious superiors. Moreover, even these figures would need to be multiplied by $22\frac{1}{2}$ if the monks and nuns were proportionately as numerous in modern England as in Henry VIII's reign. Suppose then for one moment that a Parliamentary enquiry were instituted this very year, and that the Commissioners found records of 4,000 such criminals as these among our monasteries during the past eighty-seven years. Suppose moreover that even these records were avowedly extremely fragmentary, and that the Commission calculated them to represent, at the most, only about one-tenth of the actual facts. Lastly, suppose that we knew the Orders to be already on an inclined plane on which they would slide lower and lower for centuries to come—as even the most determined apologists acknowledge that the monasteries did decline steadily from the thirteenth century to the Dissolution.[1] How many voices under such circumstances would be raised to defend these Orders in Parliament or elsewhere? With what feelings would ordinary respectable folk look forward to the probability that, four centuries hence, plausible Romanist historians, backed up by enthusiastic and romantic converts, would spread abroad the belief that those monasteries had been on the whole seminaries of virtue, and their dissolution an act of unredeemed iniquity? For myself, I feel constrained to apologise to the monks and nuns now

1. Bishop Nicke's first visitation of Norwich diocese (1514) gives more than six per cent. accused of incontinence; this would make, in terms of our present population, 4,000 unchaste monks and nuns in this year 1906.

among us for even the momentary use of their name in connection with facts which can be proved to the hilt against their medieval predecessors. These whom we see in modern England are a small minority, living amid a healthy public opinion, and under a system of law and police such as no man even dreamt of in the Middle Ages. Catholicism has long since learned that her only chance of competition with other creeds lies in real purity of life: so that, although clerical scandals are (I believe) extremely common in Southern Italy and Spain, the life of the Romanist clergy in Protestant countries is such on the whole as to command the respect even of non-Catholics. I would therefore emphatically disclaim any intention to hint evil against the monasteries now in England, apart from the danger lest the convents should become sweating-houses of cheap and insanitary labour, in the absence of such proper supervision as our law enforces in the case of other workshops. But I hope I have here written enough to show how little historical justification Mgr. Benson's book can claim; since the record of the Sussex houses in general —and indeed of all the medieval monasteries in general—is quite as bad as that Cluniac record which I have just quoted as a specimen. The writings of such disciplinary experts as Busch, Ambrose of Camaldoli, and Trittenheim—all of them distinguished monks and heads of houses—read in some places like an evil dream. The fact is that, with all his real ability and the engaging personality shown in his pages, Mgr. Benson has written a novel as false to history as the shilling shockers of our youth, with their diabolical Jesuits and walled-in nuns. Nobody in Henry VIII's time, orthodox or unorthodox, would have recognized his description of monastic life as even approximately true to the facts of that day. It bears, in fact, just about the same semblance of reality as the sentimental pink-and-white plaster statues in a Roman Catholic religious shop bear to the actual living aspect of spiritual athletes like St. Bernard and St. Francis. Inside and outside the cloister walls, his monks are as unreal as his heroine.

But he might possibly plead, with Æsop's trumpeter, that this rôle of historian has only been thrust on him by indolent reviewers: that he himself is no disciplined unit in the ranks of original research, but simply a poet whose mission it is to inspire the fighters with his music. Yet, even so, it is worth while to remonstrate with him seriously for this once. After all, the average novel has a wider circulation than the average history: and I cannot believe that Mgr. Benson would willingly propagate such strange misconceptions as those which I have here exposed.

[To this Mgr. Benson replied in the Contemporary for June; but he has declined to allow me to republish this reply. The reader must therefore be left to infer its character from my rejoinder here following, which was published in the July number.]

I willingly recognise Mgr. Benson's courtesy and honesty at the bottom of the hard things he feels bound to say about me, of his silence on what seem to me important points, and of his occasional misapprehensions. The unfair "stab" which he imputes to me lies, not in my actual words, but in his own paraphrase, coloured necessarily by his own feelings. Nor had I any idea of imputing to him the literary bad faith which I do impute to some others ; though I own that, if my words conveyed this impression to other minds than his, the blame must lie to some extent with me. But I do not feel that the three particular phrases which he adduces can bear that invidious interpretation when considered in their actual context. Each of them refers plainly not to alleged concealment of facts, but to alleged ignorance. To take his first instance : I speak of him as " cruelly misrepresenting " Cromwell by stigmatising the latter's order for the enclosure of the Religious as a novel and unjustifiable manœuvre. " It was pretty evident that a rigorous confinement would breed discontent," so writes Mgr. Benson, without one hint that such confinement was in fact emphatically enjoined by the Rule to which these monks were by profession pledged ; and that disciplinarians had for centuries protested against any relaxation as extremely perilous to monastic morality. I cannot see how this statement—which he does not attempt to justify—can be called any less than a cruel misrepresentation of Cromwell. Yet so far was I from hinting dishonesty on Mgr. Benson's part, that I took pains to explain how he had evidently been misled. He saw (I said) modern monks wandering about abroad as if the Rule were non-existent ; he had argued, like others, from modern Romanism to the Middle Ages ; and he had taken this particular blunder straight from Cardinal Gasquet, who, however, had not the same excuse for ignorance. Both here and elsewhere I tried to show (1) how frankly he had used the novelist's right of taking history at second-hand ; and (2) how sadly his trusted authorities had misled him ; so that his very success as an artist resulted in the further propagation of false history. I looked upon him as an able and honest counsel whose attorney had primed him with a faulty brief ; and his reply has but strengthened this conviction. Although the real point at issue between us is the state of the monasteries under Henry VIII, he seems to treat it sometimes almost more as a personal than as an historical question. " It is myself that is in question," he writes ; " we are not discussing the thirteenth nor even the fifteenth century, but the sixteenth," and thus he excuses himself for not having studied earlier documents, while accusing me of " almost incredible " perverseness or " adroitness " in arguing from a complete series of forty reports, of which only seven referred directly to the sixteenth century. Yet I carefully gave all the dates for my readers to judge ; nor can I understand why, without vouchsafing further reasons, he dismisses my argument as worthless. It is admitted by both parties in this discussion that the monasteries were purer in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries than in the sixteenth. Inevitably, therefore, after exhausting the direct evidence for the sixteenth century, we ask, " What evidence have we for earlier times ? Were the monks even then, as a body, such men as we should care to have amongst us now ? " I produced statistics from " The Golden Age of Monasticism " which seemed to me to supply a clear negative ; but to him this whole argument appears a mockery ; apparently because, his own studies having turned mainly on later times, he therefore denies my right to travel beyond his book. Yet I had explained that I criticised this not as a novel, but as an unconscious travesty of historical fact; and he has now no possible right to reject valuable witnesses because they were not of his own calling—to exalt, in short, his own personal limitations into a canon of historical truth or falsehood. Moreover, his own mentor, Cardinal Gasquet, goes back a whole century earlier than I do, appealing for support to those same visitation documents which, when I quote them, Mgr. Benson dismisses with loathing as "episcopal police-lists." The real difference here between myself and the Cardinal is that I give my references, while he steadily declines to give his. Nor can he now justify this refusal on the score of dignity; for in the preface to his new edition he steps down from that pedestal to revile me (in the French of Stratford attë Bowe), as a literary ragman. It is this refusal of the commonest guarantees of literary good faith—not, as Mgr. Benson asserts, our difference of opinion—which has determined me to pursue this subject so far. Indeed, it would seem almost a counsel of despair which prompted Mgr. Benson to waste, in an attempt to prejudge this question, space which would have been more profitably employed in dealing with my facts. He quotes two living historians as regarding the Cardinal's work with such "deep respect" that I have no right to attack it; as if anything could ever be proved if the consent of two men, however eminent, carried a power of tribunicial veto at the bar of history! Moreover, one of his pair is very far from bearing a name to conjure with in this matter; while the other, Dr. Gairdner, has volunteered to me the statement that he considers my exposure of the Cardinal "a powerful indictment!"[1] So far, therefore, as Mgr. Benson's argument ever had any real force, it now turns against himself.

As for his so-called parallel to my statistics, it is painful to deal with anything so slipshod. With all his license of choosing a single favourable fortnight for generalisation, he still cannot produce anything remotely approaching the percentage of immoralities revealed by Nicke's visitation of 1514 in the Norwich diocese. For a real parallel to my figures he must show, not four criminous clerks for the whole country during one particular fortnight, but over seventy-five in a single diocese like Norwich, within a space of three years.[2] He knows very well that he would need not only great diligence, but exceptional good fortune to produce even one-tenth of this proportion after years of patient study; and it is a pity that he did not work out his own figures, instead of satisfying himself with the most superficial pretence of an argument to throw at me. As a further radical difference—if such were needed—a criminous clerk is ignominiously ejected in these days; before the Reformation, ejections for unchastity were not only comparatively rare, but practically unknown for a first offence. As for his claim of imitating my methods in gratuitously

1. This letter, written by Dr. Gairdner to stop the use of his high authority in support of arguments which have not always his approval, was published, with his permission, in Church Bells for May 12th, 1906. [Before his death, Dr. Gairdner went still further, and wrote to me expressing great surprise at Cardinal Gasquet's attitude towards historical facts; see pp. 43–4 of my Medieval Studies, No. X, "Monastic Schools in the Middle Ages."]

2. He generalizes from four cases: I from 20. His figures would work out at only 104 cases in a year out of 24,000 clergy: mine are twenty in three years out of 332 monks and nuns. I work this out in my Monastic Legend.

multiplying the recorded figures by four, this is an admirable instance of the misconceptions resulting from those hole-and-corner historical ideas which prevail in his own communion. I have no mere surmises, but definite evidence to show that a large proportion of cases have been omitted from many of the medieval documents by which, in default of others more complete, I support facts already gleaned from fuller sources. I have repeatedly challenged discussion on this point with Cardinal Gasquet, Father Gerard, and the anonymous F. S. A. who writes alternately for the Church Times and for the Catholic Truth Society; indeed, I repeated this challenge in a footnote appended to the very statistics at which Mgr. Benson carps. They persistently refuse this discussion, finding it safer to throw mud at me from the comparative security of a preface, a Romanist journal, or an anonymous article; and meanwhile their wilful silence enables Mgr. Benson to write as if the reasons which I have vainly offered to his own champions were as empty as these mockeries which he flaunts in parody of what he calls "my methods!"

Wherever else he seems to make a real point against me, it is, I cannot help thinking, by misunderstanding my words. In one case this was no doubt partly my fault; I should either have been more explicit about his alleged anachronisms or have left them alone. I never dreamed of blaming him for not adopting bastard linguistic archaisms, or for keeping Tudor vermin out of sight. I referred chiefly to his importation of deeper modern refinements into those times; to the implication of his whole book that Tudor Catholicism had all the virtues and inward qualities of modern society, with something more. Nobody could guess from his book how brutally girls were often maltreated, and how hard they found it to escape obscene talk even in the best society—as Sir Thomas More not only complains, but shows by his own example. Mgr. Benson refuses to believe in the word of a man like Layton because he tells Cromwell "some tales [of monastic vice] to make you laugh." Yet More tells, with great circumstance and most undeniable relish, quite unnecessarily, a monastic story more unsavoury than any of Layton's; a story, moreover, sufficient in itself to disprove Cardinal Gasquet's assertions of the strict discipline exercised by conventual visitors. (More's English Works, pp. 1035 and 154.) On this, and similar vital points, the novelist antedates by centuries the progress of inward civilisation. Moreover, he spends more than a page in disproving an assertion which I never made. When I complain of his letting his heroine "run about alone," it is no answer to confront me with quotations which either ignore the crucial word here italicised, or definitely show (as two out of his four do) that the ladies had in fact attendants waiting on them. I know very well that Tudor ladies enjoyed more freedom than their ancestresses, or than Italian ladies; but I believe such freedom to have been far, at its best, from the "almost Victorian" liberty which Mgr. Benson asserts them to have enjoyed; nor can I believe that a self-respecting girl like Beatrice would have gone alone to interview her fiancé in his own rooms. But I am told that I err in supposing her to have been unattended on that occasion. I have just re-read the chapter (pt. II, chapter IX) and feel sure that the author, on re-reading it himself, will admit my impression to have been pardonable, if not correct. Meanwhile, if he will produce evidence rebutting my criticism as it stands, I will acknowledge my error as publicly as I asserted it.

Of his other criticisms I can only say that they seem to me to repose, partly on misreading of my words and partly on his own unfamiliarity with the facts of history. I did not, for instance, say that " if Religious are rich, it must be through oppression or greed," nor can I even guess at the words which he read in this sense. What he says, again, in excuse for their failure to keep accounts and inventories, simply proves how little he has read of papal, conciliar, and episcopal injunctions. I could point out as many mistakes of this kind as there are pages in his article, and am willing to do so in any paper he chooses, under criticism from him or from the Cardinal's earlier champion, Father Gerard. He will no doubt brand me here again with the invidious title of " controversialist," yet I am in fact as hard-worked a professional man as himself, and controversy has brought me, as probably it will always bring me, pecuniary loss without any corresponding public gain. For the last ten years I have been working at a book on medieval life which I hope to publish now in a few weeks. In this work I have found myself confronted at every turn by what seem to me the reckless, and sometimes even deliberate, misrepresentations of Romanist apologists. That is why I have stepped aside to clear the ground of weeds to which more distinguished scholars have neither time nor inclination to stoop. I have always offered to print replies at my own expense ; and, if I had nothing but controversial tricks to help me, I should long ago have been made mincemeat of by Father Gerard, who has probably written two or three hundred pages of polemics to one of mine. As it is, Father Gerard has steadily declined to face my evidence from pre-Reformation documents, even in the comparative safety of the Tablet, which could not print some of my most important proofs.

Moreover, Mgr. Benson seems curiously unable to realise how far his own book is merely destructive, or how much he and his own friends depend on " peering through the keyholes " of history, on ferreting out evil from a king's private love-letters, and on studiously blackening men and women who are as silent and helpless now, and who once suffered as cruelly, as any monk or nun. All this is the nemesis of an old evil tradition which has allowed men to use tricks for The Cause which would be reprobated in private life, with the result that Church history cannot yet be written, on either side, with the same judicial calm as other histories. No judge can sum up from concealed evidence, and the " confidence trick " has no more place in history than in law. So long, therefore, as one side deliberately rests on alleged favourable evidence from the episcopal registers, so long must others emphasize even to weariness the damning evidence which those books undoubtedly contain. The workaday Present always cuts a poor figure beside the meretricious fancies of the Past, and it is only fair to remind Mgr. Benson that nearly one-third of St. Augustine's City of God is devoted to purely destructive criticism of the polytheism which many of his contemporaries longed to have back again. So we also can never realize fully the spiritual possibilities of the age in which we live, unless we make these periodical clearances of interested mis-statements which would persuade us to hark back to the past.

P.S.—The above was already in type when I saw in the Guardian (June 6th, p. 937) a quotation from Newman which cuts one knot that had hardly seemed worthy of unravelling at the expense of a couple of pages. Having no time to verify it at the British Museum, I give it here simply on the high authority of the Guardian, which quotes it from the Roman Catholic Month (January, 1903): "Nothing could be better [Newman wrote] than an historical review. But who would bear it? Unless one doctored all one's facts, one would be thought a bad Catholic." Compare the words I have here italicised with Mgr. Benson's complaint (p. 827) that my attitude shows me to have "already decided that no Catholic priest could be anything but a falsifier of history." Even if I had not already exposed Romanist falsifications wholesale, with plain chapter and verse, and without eliciting any real evidence in their favour, I should now only need (1) to collocate Newman's words with the undeniable fact that Cardinal Gasquet is far from "being thought a bad Catholic," and (2) to draw the obvious deduction that the very completeness of Mgr. Benson's good faith has helped to make him the unconscious mouthpiece of that "doctored history" for which he is proud to own his debt to "the greatest Roman Catholic historian of our day."

VII.

Religious Education before the Reformation.[1]

BOTH Roman Catholic and High Church papers have lately attempted to contrast the present state of religious education with what they imagine it to have been before the Reformation. There are few more tempting fallacies than that which Sterne has good humouredly pilloried for all time in his "They order this matter better in France." Whatever seems amiss in the world in which our lot is cast, we are quick to imagine some golden world in which all was the opposite of this ungrateful present. The fitness of things seems to require it, and we feel that there ought to be—that there must somewhere be—historical evidence for it. It may therefore be worth while, at this particular moment, to confront this fond dream with the real facts, especially since plausible attempts have been made, in the name of serious history, to misrepresent those facts. The editor of the Catholic Times quotes Cardinal Gasquet as establishing the existence of a pre-reformation England in which education was all that it should have been, and all that it now, alas! is not! One of his correspondents, bolder still, has gathered from the same historian that there was "an age when there would have been no difficulties over an Education Bill, a time when the Church had it all its own way, and yet the Bible was taught . . . when such immense portions of Scripture were committed to memory, and that by Catholics." Such grotesque travesties of the actual facts are current not only among those who have most temptation to see one side of the question alone, but even among moderate Anglicans. They have been so often repeated, supported with such a specious show of serious evidence, and suffered so contemptuously or so supinely by those who are best qualified to contradict them, that many well-read men accept them now almost without question. Yet this theory that the pre-Reformation times were an age of thorough and widespread religious instruction not only breaks down under any fairly wide view of the actual documents, but is contradicted (as I hope to prove) even by those apologetic writings of Sir Thomas More, on which, by means of partial quotations, it has been mainly built.

Let me begin with the golden thirteenth century. At the Provincial Council of Oxford, in 1222, Stephen Langton enjoined, "Let the archdeacons at their visitations see that . . . the priests can rightly pronounce at least the formula of consecration (in the Mass), and that of baptism, and that they clearly understand the meaning of these two formulas." This injunction (which was repeated in a later Council of 1237) reveals an abyss of clerical ignorance at which we may well stagger. In an age when the Bible was in Latin, all the Church services in Latin, and only a small fraction even of popular religious books could be obtained in the vulgar tongue, it was necessary for the Provincial Councils to take elaborate precautions for ensuring that parish priests knew just enough Latin to pronounce, and understand, two every-day formulas of half-a-dozen words each! Nor are we left to the inferences, however inevitable, drawn from these injunctions; for we have on record the actual examination, in this same year, 1222, of a number of curates who had long served dean and chapter livings of Salisbury. The Curate of Sonning, who had been four years in priest's orders, was asked to construe the first words of the canon of the mass—Te igitur clementissime Pater—"We pray Thee, therefore, most merciful Father," etc. The report is, "He knew not the case of the word Te, nor by what it was governed; and having been bidden to look closely what part of the sentence could most properly govern Te, he replied: 'Pater: for He governeth all things.' We asked him what clementissime was, or what case, or how it was declined: he knew not. We asked him what was clemens: he knew not. Moreover [he knew no music and] knew by heart no part of the divine service or of the psalter. Moreover, he said that it seemed to him indecent to be examined by the dean, since he was already ordained. . . . He is sufficiently illiterate." The rest tried to concert a "passive resistance" to the examination, and for a while refused to answer: but at last their conspiracy broke down, and it is registered that the Curate of Hurst, six years a priest, "is young, and knows nothing." The Curate of Erburgefield, four years a priest, was also examined in the canon of the Mass, "and he knew nothing, either of reading or of singing." The Curate of Sandhurst had been four years there, and "could give no answers" to the same simple questions. The Curate of Ruscombe, nearly ten years a priest, "knows nothing." It must be borne in mind, firstly, that this Latin of which the five curates could not even stumble through the first line is the essential and most solemn portion of the Mass, and could almost be learnt by heart in a single day by one who really knew Latin: and secondly, that no measures were taken to get rid of any of these priests. It is possible that for dean and chapter livings curates were hired in the cheapest market, as was notoriously the case with monastic livings: yet even so it is startling to find five such incapables in seventeen churches. The contemporary register of Eudes Rigaud, of Rouen, one of the greatest of medieval prelates, gives almost equally startling results. One candidate, set to construe and parse three verses of the Bible (Heb. iv, 13-15) thought aperta ("opened") was a noun, imagined that compati ("to be touched with") had something to do with "opening," and parsed "without" as a causal conjunction. As he was also "ill-famed of quarrelling and incontinence," the archbishop decided not to admit him to the coveted benefice. Another cleric, having to construe annuus ("annual") dimly thought that it meant "often," and, when asked "how often?" replied "daily." A third, whom the archbishop found "unable to read properly or to construe," promptly gave notice of appeal to the Pope! We get similar evidence again from Germany in the fifteenth century. Johann Busch (de Ref. Mon. I, xiv) tells us how he held an archidiaconal visitation at the important town of Halle, and found one incumbent who, even with a little friendly help and after mature consideration, could not name the simple words of consecration of the Mass, "This is My Body," or "This is the Cup of My Blood." He offered, however, to find them in the Missal: but when a book was brought he pointed to the wrong place: though he proved able to read through the essential portions of the Mass "after the fashion," (as Busch puts it), "of secular priests."[1] Busch consulted with the doctors as to the validity of this man's consecrations; they agreed to hope for the best, but took the precaution of exchanging the holy wafers which he had on hand for a fresh batch consecrated by a more trustworthy colleague. Of one other obvious precaution—getting rid of the ignorant priest—there was no question. As St. Bonaventura had said two hundred years before, "If we do get rid of them, how shall we get any better to fill their places?" For, while sinners mocked at the ignorance of the clergy, saints and philosophers lamented alike the magnitude of the evil and the difficulty of reform. Scholars too often went up to the medieval universities (as Dr. Rashdall points out) without enough Latin to follow the lectures properly; not was there any definite theological training for the ordinary student.[2] Moreover, large numbers of the parish clergy had never been to a university at all. The episcopal registers supply the most curious evidence on this point, showing that there were two distinct categories of parish clergy. On the one hand were the beneficed clergy, who generally belonged to the rich and influential classes, and of whom about 75 per cent. had been presented with livings not only before they had taken holy orders, but even in their youth or their boyhood. The first act of such clerics, on receiving their benefices, was often to go to the university. On the other hand were the poor curates, who might or might not have studied, but who were generally doomed to vegetate on the lowest wages, while the fruits of their parishes were mainly consumed by absentees.[3]

1. Contemporary Review, October, 1906.

In a Church where the rectors were often schoolboys and the first requisite for a curate was that he should be cheap and unambitious, it was unlikely that any high standard could be maintained, even in such

1. It is obvious how far these fragmentary indications from orthodox sources go to corroborate Tyndale's "I dare say that there be 20,000 priests, curates, this day in England, and not so few, that cannot give you the right English unto this text in the Paternoster, Fiat voluntas tua, sicut in coelo et in terra, and the answer thereto": and the record of Bishop Hooper's visitation in 1552 which showed "scores of clergy who could not tell who was the author of the Lord's Prayer, or where it was to be found."—Tyndale's Works, vol. III (Parker Society), p. 75 and note.

2. Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, II, 701. Dr. Rashdall adds: "It is necessary to assert emphatically that the 'religious education' of a 'bygone Oxford,' in so far as it ever had any existence, was an inheritance not from the Middle Ages but from the Reformation."

3. I hope to explain this in detail, with statistics from the registers, on some future occasion.

learning as was otherwise possible under medieval conditions. "There are," writes St. Bonaventura, "so many inexperienced clerics that, even if they be well taught in grammar and other knowledge, yet where one hundred or more rectors and vicars are gathered together, there are scarcely any who have in fact enough knowledge of the Scriptures to manage either the souls committed to their care, or other things necessary for salvation." He speaks here specially of Italy, and says that things were better in France and England. But St. Thomas Aquinas, writing at Paris, complains of "the inexperience of many priests, who in some parts are found to be so ignorant that they cannot even speak Latin, and among whom very few are found who have learnt Holy Scripture." Roger Bacon, writing about the same time in England, and wishing to give an instance of mere parrot-learning, says "just as boys gabble through the Psalter which they have learnt, and as clerks and country priests recite the Church services, of which they know little or nothing, like brute beasts." Gerson, at the beginning of the fifteenth century, speaks equally strongly and far more frequently on this subject. He contrasts what he calls the restless and ill-digested Scripture studies of the heretics with the supineness of even "great prelates," who neglect "the wine of sacred wisdom" and cry, "What is this ye say to us of faith? It is enough that we are Christians, in good simplicity: that is enough; for he who pries into majesty shall be oppressed by its glory; and there is no need to seek things so lofty for us." Again he asks, "Are all ecclesiastics bound to study God's Law? It would seem so . . . yet on the other side it may be argued that to assert this is to place by far the greater part of ecclesiastics outside the way of salvation, and to assert that they are doomed to damnation." He speaks of the lamentable lack of religious books of any kind among the parish clergy, and complains that there was no organised attempt to multiply good writings against the rising tide of infidelity: to this supineness, and to the ignorance of the beneficed clergy, he attributes a great deal of what he calls the notorious decay of the Catholic Church. Finally, complaining somewhat rhetorically in the person of Holy Church to the Pope, he cries, "What priest wilt thou give me who knoweth God's Law!" (Vol. I, p. 349 c. De Laud Script. Consid. X-XII; Vol. I, pp. 204 A, 268 A, 349 C. Vol. II, 552 A; cf. I 205 F, 208 C, 339 A-C). Nor were the monks better than the parish clergy in this respect. Popes and prelates alike, when providing that the Monastic Rule or other similar injunctions should be read aloud, ordained that these should be read not only in Latin but also in the vulgar tongue: and it was taken as quite natural that the most pious lay-brethren could not follow the sense of the Nicene Creed during mass. The friars did indeed revive the study of the Bible among the clergy: but they did little to spread the knowledge of the actual text among the laity, who were fed almost as much on glosses and pious embroideries as on the plain facts of Scripture history. Even the famous Meditations on the Life of Christ, once attributed to St. Bonaventura, and now traced to one of his disciples, alloy the Gospel story with a good 20 per cent. of sheer romance, based upon the author's own surmises of what might have happened, or on revelations vouchsafed to "a holy brother of our Order." These additions, it need hardly be said, mostly tend to give the Virgin Mary a prominence or an authority which the Evangelists have neglected to give her. Chaucer's keen eye noted this habit of the friars, and he shows us too how much more the popular mind was attracted by these apocryphal legends than by the bare truth. His clerk, Nicholas, speaking to the carpenter about Noah's flood, has no doubt that the latter will specially remember the least Biblical feature of that event as conceived in the later Middle Ages—the refusal of Noah's wife to embark, until she has drunk one more pot of ale with her jolly gossips ashore !

Nor are the instances which I have hitherto quoted rare and exceptional ; the evidence of clerical ignorance all through the Middle Ages —and, unfortunately, for a generation or so after the Reformation—is overwhelming. When Dean Colet, in 1509, complained that all applicants were admitted indiscriminately to Holy Orders, so that the Church swarmed with " a multitude of unlearned and evil priests," he was only repeating, almost in so many words, what the Bishop of Mende had said to the Pope at the Council of Vienne in 1311. Moreover, both Colet and the Bishop lay stress on the fact that laws had been frequently enacted against these abuses, and that the Church needed no new legislation, but simply courage to enforce time-honoured and repeatedly-enacted laws. For, by a strange perversion of history, one of the plainest proofs of medieval religious ignorance has been distorted by modern apologists into an argument for religious knowledge. If Council after Council, thundering against the " dumb dogs that bark not," enjoined that the clergy should at least be competent to read and speak Latin, and should give at least a certain minimum of elementary religious instruction from the pulpit, surely common sense would suggest that the very repetition and emphasis of such injunctions pointed to something wrong in practice. Yet Mgr. Vaughan in his Faith and Folly (p. 4), undertakes to prove by " the following indisputable authorities " that the Church has always fostered learning. He then proceeds to give bare references, without quotations, to five Church Councils, the references themselves being full of blunders and evidently copied from some French book. The ingenious student who manages to verify these references will find them of this following type : " Henceforward let no Bishop be suffered to confer deacon's or priest's orders on an illiterate man ; and let any such, who may already have been ordained, be now compelled to learn. . . . What doth he in the Church of God if he be not skilled to read ? " Cardinal Gasquet, again, in his Eve of the Reformation and his essay on Religious Instruction in England, hardly comes any nearer to the real point. His references to episcopal registers are not accurate ; and, even if the facts were as he states them, they prove no more than that medieval villagers were generally as unwilling as modern Irish villagers to bring formal accusations of ignorance or neglect against their priests. On the other hand, like Mgr. Vaughan, he relies mostly on the repeated injunctions of Councils, and the repeated attempts of prominent Churchmen to encourage systematic teaching on the part of the parish clergy, without realising that the very multiplication of such injunctions, in the absence of direct evidence that they were obeyed, tells heavily against his own case. Gerson, indeed, twice mentions such injunctions, but only to imply that they were very imperfectly kept (II 552 F and De Laud Script. Consid. XII). And indeed we have the most definite evidence that this theoretical system of instruction was even less realised in practice than the average of medieval theories. Bishop Haymo of Hythe, founding an almshouse in 1337 for the special benefit of men of good position who had come down in the world, made it a sine qua non that they should know the Lord's prayer, the Ave, and the Creed ; and we have many other indications to show how necessary his stipulation was. Berthold of Ratisbon, a mission-preacher of European fame, complains more than once that children reach the age of seven, fourteen, even twenty, without even learning their Lord's Prayer ; and the same complaint was made by others, in those ages when the clergy exercised the most despotic disciplinary powers over their parishioners. Again, the fifteenth century translation of the Gesta Romanorum, published by the Early English Text Society, shows the grossest ignorance of the Bible ;—texts from the Apocalypse, Ezekiel and Canticles are quoted as from the Gospels ; two from the Gospels and one from Job are attributed to St. Paul ; Genesis is confused with Psalms, Isaiah with St. James ; scraps of the Fathers are palmed off as Bible texts. The Knight of La Tour-Landry, though his book was the most popular educational treatise of the later Middle Ages, and he claims to have written it with the help of two priests and two clerks whom he had in his castle, shows a still deeper ignorance of the Bible. His history of Ruth has scarcely anything but the heroine's name in common with the Scriptural narrative ; Boaz is not even alluded to ; the whole story is of Ruth's struggle with her stepsons for her late husband's property ! A well-known carol of the fifteenth century makes Herod execute St. Stephen on the day after Christ's birth. The Franciscan Salimbene (A.D. 1280) bears incidentally the most damning testimony as to the Biblical ignorance both of clergy and of laity in the Italy (and perhaps the France) of his day. He tells us how he had heard priests quote " a hundred times," as a text from St. Paul's Epistles, the cynical maxim of sacerdotal conduct, " si non caste, tamen caute " (" if we live not chastely, let us at least sin with caution "). His contemporary Berthold of Ratisbon bears similar testimony in his complaint that " many thousands," persuaded by indulgence-mongers, " falsely believe that they have done penance for all their sins with a penny or halfpenny . . . and so go straight to hell." The Oxford Chancellor Gascoigne, two centuries later, is still more emphatic on this last subject.

We may glean from many of the medieval preachers a vivid idea of the ignorance and carelessness with which they had to wrestle. Let me quote from Berthold again. Some (he says) have not been seen in church for a month, or ten weeks, or even six months, though the women are better than the men. When they do come, " it irks some to stand decently for a short hour in church, while God is being served with singing or reading ; they laugh and chatter as if they were at a fair. They talk in church across from one to the other, and boast and tell what they have seen in foreign lands, so that one may well disturb six or ten others who would have gladly held their tongues. . . . And ye women, ye never give your tongues rest from useless talk! One tells the other how glad the maidservant is to sleep, and how loth to work; another tells of her husband; a third complains that her children are troublesome and sickly!" At this a cry of expostulation rises from the audience: "Yea, Brother Berthold, but we understand not the Mass, and therefore can we not pray as we had need, nor may we feel such devotion as if we understood the Mass. The sermon indeed we can follow word by word, but not the Mass; we know not what is being sung or read, we cannot comprehend it. If it were so that we understood the Mass, then might we pray far better to God and beseech His grace, and have greater devotion in the Mass with prayer and other good things." Sir Thomas More also (whom Cardinal Gasquet has tried to press into the service of his theory) tells us how little the congregation understood the Mass; and Busch shows the same in describing how, during an interdict, the monks obeyed the Pope by suspending their Masses, without offending the townsfolk who demanded that these should proceed as usual. The Brethren had only to ring the bells and play their organ in the choir; and the citizens in the nave were quite happy in the belief that Mass was being said behind the screen. It is indeed difficult to realise how little the ordinary medieval layman really comprehended of the Church services, and how perfunctory was even his personal attendance. From very early times we find complaints that parishioners went in and out pretty well as they chose during Mass. As St. Bernardino puts it, "There are many ignorant folk who, when the priest is celebrating, come drunken from the taverns or wait outside the church, talking of their oxen and worldly matters, and even of obscenities; nor do they enter the church until the elevation, at which they gaze in utter irreverence, with their heads partly or wholly covered, and their stiff knees scarcely bowed; and thus—after running noisily to see the Body of Christ, half inside and half outside the Church—suddenly, after the barest glimpse of Him, they run off again as hastily as if they had seen not Christ but the Devil!" The same complaint was made at the Council of Cologne in 1536, and repeated only five years later. The Knight of La Tour-Landry, writing for the instruction of his motherless daughters, confesses his own adhesion to that rigorous school which "susteineth that none shulde not speak no manner thing whiles they ben atte masse, and in especial atte the gospelle." Members of the third Orders of St. Dominic or St. Francis, among other very strict rules of conduct, were pledged not to talk during Mass or sermon. Among the brief and solemn instructions which St. Louis gave to his sons upon his deathbed, was the warning to "attend the service of Holy Church devoutly and without jesting talk; . . . more especially in the Mass when the consecration is made." Nor was this irreverence by any means confined to the laity. A bull of Clement V (1311) complains that many clergy gabble through or cut short the daily services, "with frequent intermixture of idle, profane, and unhonest discourse"; Gerson asserts that the clergy laugh and chatter during service "like old women at market." More than one set of Cathedral

Statutes forbids conversation between clergy at a distance of more than three (or in some cases four) stalls from each other ; and in visitations of great churches both in England and in Normandy it is constantly noted that those who should be performing divine service are laughing, talking, or even walking about instead. Moreover, even the most formal offices of religious education were constantly neglected. Sacchetti speaks of " a good many " who did not feel certain that they had been baptised, and consoles them with the assurance that God would take their faith as equivalent to the deed. Gascoigne says that many children died unbaptised through the fault of the monastic clergy. A constitution of Archbishop Peckham (1287) complains that there were in England " numberless people grown old in evil days who had not yet received the grace of Confirmation " ; and similar evidence has survived from Germany, Flanders and Austria.

Amid all this negligence and ignorance, religious knowledge flourished only among the unorthodox. We know this on the testimony of their most determined adversaries. " They know the Apostles' Creed excellently in the vulgar tongue," says Etienne de Bourbon in speaking of thirteenth century heretics ; " they learn by heart the Gospels or the New Testament in the vulgar tongue, and repeat them aloud to each other. . . . I have seen a young cowherd who had dwelt but one year in the house of a Waldensian heretic, yet had attended so diligently and repeated so carefully all that he heard, as to have learned by heart within that year forty Sunday Gospels, not counting those for feast-days ; all which he had learned word for word in his native tongue, apart from other extracts from sermons and prayers. I have also seen some layfolk who were so steeped in their doctrine that they could even repeat by heart a great part of the Evangelists, as Matthew or Luke, and especially all that is said therein of our Lord's teaching and speeches ; so that they could repeat them continuously with scarcely a wrong word here and there. This I say on account of their diligence in evil and the negligence of the Catholics in good : for many of these latter are so negligent of their own and their families' salvation as scarce to know their Pater or their Creed, or to teach the same to their servants." Berthold of Ratisbon says the same of the Jews, that they knew their Bible better than Christian laymen, and were therefore dangerous adversaries. Gerson also complained that the neglect of religious education at Christian Universities contrasted disgracefully with the careful teaching given among the Jews (II, 761, 762). At the same time the Church blindly attempted to right herself by suppressing these unlicensed Scripture studies, instead of rivalling them by the thoroughness of her own instruction in orthodoxy : and even the enlightened and fair-minded Johann Busch, who would allow the laity some religious books in their mother tongue, disapproved of " such lofty or divine books " as a translation of the Communion service : indeed, finding one in the hands of some nuns, he committed it to the flames (De Ref., p. 731). Compare with this the express testimony of Busch's elder contemporary Gerson. " We do not say that all have a right to possess or read holy books—especially books whose difficulties need explanation through other treatises and glosses of doctors —for the common folk have neither wit not learning to do thus : but they ought to seek the law from the mouths of the priests. Yet it seemeth not right to keep them from moral and devout works which have neither difficulty nor ambiguity nor absurdity in their translation, such as are the histories or lives or legends of the saints, and holy meditations. Translations in [the case of] other books are rightly blamed, since they offer more occasion for arrogant error than for humble devotion or salutary learning " (De Laud Script. Consid. XI). When perhaps the greatest and best Churchman of the fourteenth century wrote like this, we need not wonder that Tyndale found it easy to persuade men that the clergy condemned his own translation of the Bible mainly because they feared the exposure of their own juggleries with Biblical texts. Cardinal Gasquet's modern apology that only unorthodox translations of Bibles were kept from the laity is demonstrably false, and is contradicted even by Sir Thomas More, whom he strangely quotes as the principal witness in its defence.[1] More does indeed give a somewhat qualified denial to such sweeping accusations as those of Tyndale ; but he admits that, while heretics spent great sums on the Bible, yet no orthodox printer of his day dared to print any existing version, lest it should be condemned and destroyed by the authorities. He thinks that the Bible needs to be masticated by the clergy before it is fit for the stomachs of the laity. He proposes the most ingenious devices by which the people may read a little of the Scriptures without learning too much. Let the Bible first be translated (he says) under proper authority by some good Catholic. Let each Bishop be provided with copies to lend in his diocese, but with infinite precautions, " to such as he perceiveth honest." At the honest man's death, the Bible must revert to the Bishop, lest it fall into dangerous hands. Moreover, even these honest readers may not always be suffered to study at will : some men are fit to read the synoptic Gospels, to whom the Bishop would yet forbid St. John : to others again he might permit Ephesians, but by no means Romans. It was a pity, thought More, that some such scheme of Bible education had not been put into practice long ago. (English Works, pp. 240 ff.)

Indeed, it was even more regrettable than he could have foreseen, dying as he did before the great upheaval. If, from the thirteenth century onwards, the clergy had rivalled or outdone the heretics in Bible study and Bible teaching, there might perhaps have been no Reformation ; but the Roman Catholic Church would also have been very different to what we now know under that name. The Church against which the Reformers protested was one in which the laity at large had never known why they believed, and seldom even what they were supposed to believe. No sooner was full light thrown upon it than it began to crumble away ; for the faith of an educated modern Roman Catholic differs in many essential particulars even from that of the learned and candid More.

1. " This absolute denial of any attitude of hostility on the part of the Church to the translated Bible is reiterated in many parts of Sir Thomas More's English works." " It has been already pointed out how Sir Thomas More completely disposed of this assertion as to the hostility of the Clergy to the open Bible." Gasquet. The Eve of the Reformation (1900), pp. 243, 246.

The more violently modern apologists emphasise or exaggerate the unworthiness of the persons and of the methods by which the Reformation was brought about, the more they compel us to seek other than personal causes for a change so sudden and so complete. In proportion as we are forbidden to explain it by the moral strength of the new doctrines, the plainest common sense compels us to surmise some fatal weakness in the old order of things: nor are we left to such surmises alone, for the impartial study of pre-Reformation records shows us fatal weaknesses in every direction. The people at large were not "robbed," as some men would now assure us, of the old faith. That which fell away from them at the Reformation was a faith which, in the true sense, in the sense not only of passive assent but of rational assent, they had never really held.

Appendices.

APPENDIX I.

A Rough List of Misstatements and Blunders in Cardinal Gasquet's Writings.

See Preface to 2nd Edition. The following list makes no pretence to completeness in face of the Cardinal's frequent habit of quoting without the vaguest reference to chapter, page, or even title of the book to which he professedly appeals. But the text, however incomplete, is necessarily long and wearisome. For the convenience of most readers, who may have no wish to wade all through so monotonous a record, a classification has been made by means of typographical indications. The sign D refers to cases where the real documentary evidence has been suppressed or distorted. Where such misstatements have further been reprinted in cold blood by the Cardinal, after their public exposure by responsible critics whose strictures can hardly have escaped his notice, such a repetition of the original offence is marked by a DD. Blunders with regard to the text of the Latin Vulgate Bible, or other blunders in Latin which throw direct light on his qualifications as a Vulgate critic, are marked V; blunders in monastic history are marked M. For convenience of reference, the paragraphs are numbered consecutively. Italics are mine, unless otherwise stated.

The Old English Bible.

It will be best to begin with this book, since this was the first in which Cardinal Gasquet's methods were pilloried, not by the present writer, but by a well-known Anglican clergyman, in the Church Quarterly for October, 1900, and January, 1901. References in this place to the Old English Bible are to the first edition (1897), and to the second (1908).

DD 1. Old English Bible, p. 129 [New Ed., p. 111].

"We shall look in vain, in the edition of Wycliffite scriptures published by Forshall and Madden, for any trace of these errors" [i.e. the thirteen erroneous articles condemned by Bishop Fitzjames of London, in 1514, and printed from his Register by Foxe (ed. Townsend IV, 186)].

The Church Quarterly points out that every one of those thirteen propositions occurs, almost textually, in Forshall and Madden's edition (January, 1901, p. 292). The first occurs as early as p. 3. The Church

Quarterly printed the two side by side, showing that Cardinal Gasquet had made a blunder as gross and as inexplicable as if he had denied that his own name began with a G. The Cardinal's only answer to this has been to reprint the falsehood, unaltered, in his second edition, eight years after the exposure. There was, in fact, only one other alternative, possible to most scholars, but quite impossible for a Roman Catholic prelate. Upon this alleged absence of the thirteen propositions, he had founded his theory that " it is hardly possible to read the prologue referred to, without seeing that the author of this translation had a filial reverence for the teaching of the approved doctors of the Church, and was most scrupulous in his endeavour to translate the words exactly in accordance with the prevailing authoritative teaching." To have admitted that this prologue did really contain the thirteen officially condemned propositions, and was in fact the very prologue which convicted Richard Hunne of " gross and manifest heresy," would have been to knock the bottom out of his own case. The Cardinal had therefore to choose between (1) withdrawing altogether an integral portion of his theory, or (2) reprinting not only the theory itself, but the false assertion upon which it had been based. He chose the latter alternative.

DD 2. O. E. B., p. 118 [New Ed., p. 101].

Cardinal Gasquet, having quoted a dozen lines from this same prologue, adds " it would seem tolerably certain, from the above extract, that the writer had no knowledge of any previous translation."

The Church Quarterly pointed out that, if the Cardinal had read only twenty-six lines further, he would have found a passage in which the writer explicitly refers to the previous translation, using the words : " the English Bible late translated." The Cardinal (it appears) had borrowed this blunder, without acknowledgment, from J. H. Blunt's inaccurate article in the old edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Here again, however, a whole theory had been based upon the falsehood, which is therefore reprinted without alteration in the 2nd edition.

DD 3. O. E. B., p. 113 [New Ed., p. 97].

The Cardinal lays stress on " the silence of Wyclif himself " as to English translations of the Bible. Mr. F. D. Matthew, one of the most eminent living editors of Wyclif's texts, answered this in the English Historical Review for 1895, pp. 93–4. He pointed out that, if the Cardinal had merely taken the trouble to refer to the word Bible in the indices to Wyclif's published works, he would have found at least eight or nine passages contradicting this assertion. The Cardinal met this only by a furtive insinuation of discourtesy against Mr. Matthew, (who is in fact one of the most courteous of men), and has twice reprinted the falsehood without alteration.

DD 4. O. E. B., p. 129 [New Ed., p. 112].

Cardinal Gasquet argues " from the absolute silence of all records, both ecclesiastical and lay, as to any Wycliffite version of the Bible." The Church Quarterly (pp. 286–7) pointed out that this again was false, since the Episcopal Registers contain much evidence of the kind here denied. The statement is reprinted without alteration.

DD 5. The Cardinal appeals to Sir E. M. Thompson as saying that the Old Testament translation "it is tolerably certain, owes nothing to Wyclif's pen." The Church Quarterly (p. 266) points out that Sir E. M. Thompson says, on the contrary, "the remaining portion of the Old Testament may have been finished by Wyclif himself." (O. E. B., p. 112 : cf. 113 : New Ed., p. 95).

DD 6. The Church Quarterly, on the same page, pillories a similar attempt to make Messrs. Forshall and Madden say the opposite of what in fact they say. (O. E. B., p. 113 : New Ed., p. 96).

DD 7. Professor Shirley is misquoted as saying that Wyclif's "poor priests" were really "mere lay preachers." Though corrected by the Church Quarterly and by Mr. Matthew (E. H. R. 1895, p. 97), Cardinal Gasquet deliberately reprints this misstatement, to which he has given the emphasis of italics. (O. E. B., p. 153 : New Ed., p. 132).

DD 8. He misquotes Cranmer as saying that, in pre-Reformation times, the English Bible was "in daily use," and that such use was "a well-known custom of the Church." Cranmer, (as the Church Quarterly points out (pp. 271–2) says in fact the opposite of this. (O. E. B., p. 177 : New Ed., p. 154).

DD 9. A copy of this English Bible was given to Syon Nunnery by Lady Danvers in 1517. Therefore, argues the Cardinal, it cannot have been a Wycliffite translation, since "it must appear as nothing less than the height of absurdity to suppose that any lady would insult its inmates by offering for their acceptance an heretical version of the English Bible." The Church Quarterly points out that the still existing catalogue of Syon shows the nuns to have possessed, in fact, several of Wyclif's tracts (p. 276). (O. E. B., p. 145 : New Ed., p. 125).

DD 10. Another belonged to Bishop Bonner : could "that malleus haereticorum" (implies the Cardinal) have possessed an heretical Bible ? The Church Quarterly (p. 276) points out that the same source which names Bonner as the possessor, specifies not only that this particular Bible was "translated out of Latyne in time of Heresye," but also that another copy was in the possession of the contemporary Bishop of Lichfield, who has made a note in the margin which shows that he took its Wycliffian origin for granted. (O. E. B., p. 143 : New Ed., p. 123).

DD 11. One MS. of the so-called Wycliffite version, still existing, belonged to the ultra-orthodox Henry VI, and was given by him to the monks of the Charterhouse. Here again the Cardinal insists upon the absurdity of supposing that this can really have been any other than "the perfectly orthodox translation of the English Church." The Church Quarterly points out that the Cardinal had not actually consulted this MS. before urging his argument. The medieval copyist, by a slip, has betrayed himself, and has shown most unquestionably that he copied Henry VI's Bible from Wycliffite originals (p. 278). (O. E. B., p. 140 : New Ed., p. 121).

DD 12. The Cardinal, (arguing that Archbishop Arundel's prohibitory constitution concerns not the whole Bible, or whole books of the Bible, but simply detached "passages"), refers to Lyndwood's Provinciale in proof of this assertion. The Church Quarterly (p. 281) points out that Lyndwood, in fact, says the exact opposite of this, explaining that the words in dispute refer to "a book containing the whole Bible." To the page of Lyndwood thus quoted, the Reviewer might in fact have added another, where Lyndwood goes out of his way to remind the reader, by a marginal note, that Arundel's constitution rehearses the perils of "translating the Bible into another tongue" (Ed. 1679. Append. II, p. 66). The Cardinal, as usual, reprints his assertion unaltered. (O. E. B., p. 170: New Ed., p. 148).

V 13. One even more interesting point, however, the Reviewer has failed to note. Cardinal Gasquet, apart from his appeal to Lyndwood, bases his argument upon a point of Latin scholarship. He asks us to take it, on his own authority, that "aliquis textus" can only mean "any passage," and cannot signify a complete volume. Yet, in the ecclesiastical language of the Middle Ages, textus was the consecrated word for the whole volume containing the four Gospels; it is so common in this sense that Maigne d'Arnis does not trouble to specify any separate authority, but characterizes it as used "passim." The sense of "detached passage," which the Cardinal asserts to be the only possible sense, is comparatively rare—except, of course, in the sense of text as opposed to gloss, which lies quite outside his argument.

14. With regard to this tedious list of republished falsehoods, and the still more tedious list to follow, it must be remarked that the Cardinal has not even the partial excuse of reprinting from stereotyped plates, which might have been expensive to alter. Only the later editions of his Henry VIII, from 1899 onwards, are printed from such plates. In all other cases, the printers have been instructed, in cold blood, to set up the falsehoods a second time in type.

M 15. Moreover, this is emphasized by the rare cases in which the Cardinal has actually made alterations in a later edition: his exceptional repentances are almost as significant as his habitual impenitence. For instance, on p. 238 of his English Monastic Life, he made the extraordinary assertion that St. Clare was St. Francis's sister. Even the Athenæum, usually so indulgent to him, permitted itself a mild sarcasm on this point. This blunder stood by itself; it could be silently corrected without in any way affecting the rest of the book; it was therefore silently corrected in the 2nd edition. I know of no case in which the Cardinal has corrected any misstatement, however gross, which involved the slightest reconstruction of his theories, or any retraction whatever of an opinion once emphatically expressed.

Henry VIII and the English Monasteries.

I have already pointed out that this book constantly confuses two entirely separate issues, the question of Henry's guilt and the question of the real state of the monasteries. This second question is the only one which seriously interests the modern public, yet Cardinal Gasquet scarcely devotes a tenth of his book to its direct discussion;

he constantly tries to smuggle in a verdict for monastic innocence, under cover of our condemnation for the frequent injustices committed at the Suppression. Yet there is no lack of materials: the mass of monastic chronicles and official records is simply overwhelming; our knowledge of life in court or in camp during the Middle Ages is vague and insignificant compared to what we may learn of monastic life by studying the printed records alone. He avoids in his book all serious consideration of fourteenth and fifteenth century records; he has since refused the most direct challenges to discuss those records; and the late Father Gerard, who came forward as his champion, refused with equal obstinacy to discuss them.[1] The following corrections, therefore, deal only with those small portions of Cardinal Gasquet's book which really concern me; of Henry's injustice I have already spoken sufficiently plainly. Quotations are from the 3rd edition, 1888. From the latest edition (1898) passages have been omitted which described too correctly, from orthodox sources, the decay of church life in the later Middle Ages: e.g. episcopal non-residence—Bellarmine's confession that "well-nigh there was no religion"—the insufficiency of preaching—and Colet's famous Convocation sermon of 1511, warning the clergy that nothing but reform could avert a catastrophe (pp. 18–31). All these omissions, of course, aggravate the one-sidedness of the evidence put before the reader in this latest edition. Moreover, even in the early editions, Cardinal Gasquet ignores the strong evidence which may be gathered against the monasteries from Colet's life. Erasmus states that Colet "had very little liking for the monasteries, of which many in these days are false to their name[2] . . . not that he disliked Religious Orders, but because the men did not act up to their profession": Erasmus goes on to say that Colet himself would gladly have retired to a monastery "if he could find anywhere a community really determined to live the evangelical life," and that he had some hopes of finding one such in Italy or in Germany. He did in fact take rooms later on among the Carthusians of Sheen, but not as a monk. (Erasmus, Ep. 435, Ed. 1703, vol. III, col. 458–9, quoted in Lupton's "Life of Dean Colet," p. 216).

D 16. In his third chapter, Cardinal Gasquet attempts to deprecia the moral significance of Wolsey's monastic reforms, and to represent them mainly as a political job. For this purpose (vol. I, p. 71) he suppresses a sentence from a letter in which the Bishop of Worcester, approving of Wolsey's reforms from the moralist's point of view, anticipates that "many faults would be found" when it came to the turn of the English nunneries to be visited.[3]

1. See my article in the Contemporary Review for December, 1905, on Catholic Truth and Historical Truth, and the resulting correspondence in the Tablet from December 9th, 1905, to February 10th, 1906. I published my own share of this in a pamphlet now out of print; Father Gerard refused to let me print his letters side by side with mine.

2. [Quae nunc falso nomine pleraque sic vocantur.] In Italy and Germany, while the general average of monasticism was lower than in England, a certain number of houses had been very vigorously reformed since the Council of Bâle.

V 3. Brewer, to whose Calendar the Cardinal refers as his authority, renders "many errors will be found in them (the nunneries)." The context (which I give below) shows that errores is here used in its not uncommon sense of faults. It may be noted that, in the previous

D 16A. The same bias, and even greater inaccuracy, may be found a few pages earlier in his account of Fisher's similar measures for the suppression of Heigham nunnery. The Cardinal writes (p. 65) " At the time of Bishop Fisher's proceedings, which were very regular, the convent bore a bad character and one at least of the nuns had been accused of serious immorality ten years before. No charge of later date was apparently brought against any of the three nuns, and, as is remarked in the 'Monasticon,' it seems to be probable that the fewness of the numbers had as much to do with the dissolution as the life." These sentences which I have italicized falsify both (a) Fisher's report and (b) the Monasticon text.

(a) The Bishop's commissary, after reporting that the numbers of nuns had fallen from sixteen to three because the convent " was much frequented by wanton persons, especially clergy, by reason of whom the nuns therein dwelling were grievously ill-famed of incontinence," proceeds as follows : " after that your Paternity . . . had raised the number of the nuns in this convent to five, not only were several (plures) of the aforesaid nuns debauched by a priest, and some of them gotten with child, whereof they were convicted in due form of law before your Paternity, but also, etc., etc."

(b) The comment attributed to the Monasticon is certainly not anywhere on the page cited by Cardinal Gasquet, and seems to be a pure figment ; so at least I am forced to conclude, after ascertaining by a double search on my own account, and a third search undertaken by a friend, that no words even remotely resembling these can be found in the whole Monasticon article on Heigham. Moreover, it is difficult to understand how anyone, in the face of the actual evidence given to Bishop Fisher, could surmise that " the fewness of the numbers had as much to do with the dissolution as the life."

M 17. Vol. I, p. 256. I have already pointed out that the order for the strict claustration of monks and nuns, which is here made a sin against Cromwell, is really a prominent provision of the Benedictine Rule itself (p. 60). In order to prejudice Cromwell still further, Cardinal Gasquet quotes a letter from Ap Rice to the effect that the monks cannot be expected to keep this strict seclusion. But he carefully omits from Ap Rice's letter the further remark, that he considered it equally difficult, in the then condition of English monasticism, to enforce another still more essential clause of discipline which Cromwell had revived at the same time—that no women should be admitted within the monastery precincts. The full text of Ap Rice's letter shows that the monks of the sixteenth century had, (as orthodox disciplinarians had long before complained) grown to consider indiscipline as their established right.

---

sentence, Brewer's text exactly reverses the sense of the word morigera (not complaining, but obedient) ; and that Cardinal Gasquet, while arranging Brewer's text in other ways to suit his thesis, copies this blunder. Did not Brewer really write compliant, and is not complain a printer's error, which the Cardinal has unsuspectingly adopted ? The text runs (British Museum, Vit. B. III, f. 282b : old foliation 231b) : " Verum enimvero, quantum per multos annos, in quibus diversis vicibus istuc [animum] contuli, conspicere possum, magna mihi reformandi monasteria necessitas visa [es]t : quod nunc D. V. Rmam facturam haud vereor ; quae res ipsi apud Deum [m]agno merito et ingenti penes istud inclytum regnum laudi certissime [fu]tura est. Meae diocesis eidem, quoad possum, commendo monasteria, [q]uae ut spero morigera reperientur. Monialium vero monasteriis magna [ad]hibenda est cura, in ipsis enim multi invenientur errores."

D 18. Vol. I, p. 266. Cardinal Gasquet quotes a story of the wickedness of Henry's Visitors in 1535 on the authority of "Sanders, almost a contemporary." Sanders, a bitter partisan, was in fact five years old in 1535. To take a parallel instance, what decent modern historian would venture to blacken Queen Mary's character on similar hearsay evidence from a bitter Protestant, born only five years before the alleged occurrence, and recording it without further corroboration fifty-five years later?

The Cardinal then quotes a similar rumour on Thomas Fuller's authority. Fuller, who was born seventy-three years after the alleged occurrence, warns the reader that he quotes it as a partisan rumour. But the Cardinal attempts to weaken the force of this warning by adding "he [Fuller] then goes on to relate a story which bears out what he has said." Yet, on reference to this second story, we find that Fuller records it with an even more emphatic caveat than the first. After warning the reader that it comes, at second-hand, from "Sir William Stanley, Kt., afterwards employed in the Low Countries," Fuller adds: "All I will say to this story is this, that if this Sir William Stanley was he who, contrary to his solemn oath to the earl of Leicester and the United States, betrayed the strong city of Deventer to the Spaniards, and lived many years after in a neglected, forlorn condition, one so faithless in his deeds may be presumed false in his words, and the whole credit of the relation may justly at least be suspected" (Book VI, sect. III, p. 8). All this Cardinal Gasquet carefully suppresses; and, under cover of this suppression, he writes later on, "It is evident that the blood of the old Puritan [Fuller] was stirred within him, and he must have felt that the disgraceful relations made to him were only too true." (Vol. II, p. 225, note).

DD 19. To the equally glaring suppression of the crucial points in Thorold Rogers's verdict, I called the Cardinal's attention in 1906, in a registered letter (see Monastic Legend, p. 11). The passage is reprinted without correction in the latest edition; Rogers is still represented as testifying to the exact opposite of his real convictions; in short, the only notice which the Cardinal takes of the correction is to abuse me in his preface. (Ed. 1906, pp. vii–ix).

20. Vol. I, p. 278. The Cardinal, in order to discredit the hostile evidence of a monk, quotes from Brewer's Calendar (Vol. IX, no. 231–2), to stigmatize him as a lazy and self-indulgent member of the convent. Though there is nothing to warn us that this is not a verbal quotation, a reference to the actual Calendar will show that the Cardinal (1) has suppressed the fact that the monk had been excused Matins "considering my infirmity," (an indulgence very frequently granted in the most orthodox times), and (2) that, where the Cardinal represents him as writing "I do not like" the full burdens of monastic observance, he does in fact write "He [my Abbot] knows that I cannot endure (i.e. support) them."

M 21. In the same letter, Cardinal Gasquet thus glosses the word frayter: "i.e. the community recreations." Frayter or Frater is a very common word in medieval monastic documents, and means exactly the opposite of this; viz. the refectory and its regular diet, which monks very commonly avoided by exchanging it for more generous meals outside the refectory; such meals being often called recreations.

D 22. Vol. I, p. 279. He deals equally unjustly with another witness, John Musard the monk of Worcester. The very authority on which he relies (Calendar, vol. IX, no. 497) shows Musard claiming that "many of our convent" had formally accused the Prior of incontinence before the Visitors, a claim which Cardinal Gasquet conceals partly by calculated omissions and partly by actual distortions of fact. A fuller reference to Noake's Monastery and Cathedral of Worcester (pp. 198, 202) shows that Musard's other accusations against his superior receive considerable corroboration from official documents, and that the Bishop himself, as early as 1522, had been compelled to subject this same Prior to much the same disciplinary measures which Cardinal Gasquet abuses Cromwell for using.

Moreover, while dealing at length with this subject of complaints from different monks to Cromwell, the Cardinal omits all reference to the Bodmin and Pershore cases in the same collection, which would have been far more difficult to explain away (Wright's Suppression, pp. 130, 132). The Prior of Bodmin complains that his own flock "of long continuance have lived unthriftily and against the good order of religion, to the great slander of the same, as all the country can tell," and that the Bishop's recent attempts to bring them back to the Rule has simply roused them to revolt. At Pershore, a monk complains of the nightly compotations of his fellows in words which are borne out by visitation records and other unexceptionable medieval sources.

M 23. Vol. I, p. 307. The Act of Suppression of 1536 is based upon the vices alleged to be common in monasteries where the inmates number less than twelve. To this Cardinal Gasquet objects "on the face of it, it is absurd. . . . Such a limit . . . is made ridiculous, when it is set as the line of demarcation between virtue and vice." To this he adds in a note "The number 12 was probably introduced ad captandum."

On the contrary, it had long been a commonplace among medieval monastic disciplinarians that houses of less than twelve were difficult to keep in moral health. Hugh, of St. Victor, four centuries before this, alludes to it as a fixed principle among the Benedictines. The Cistercians, Dominicans, and Franciscans, always tried to ensure that no community should fall below twelve. There was even a technical word, conventualis, sometimes applied to monasteries which came up to this necessary standard. It is true that disciplinarians constantly failed here, and that large numbers of convents fell below the "conventual" standard; but the failure was often deplored as disastrous. St. Bernard wrote to a fellow-abbot "it is by God's inspiration . . . that thou art destroying the synagogues of Satan; that is, cells apart from the parent abbey, wherein dwell three or four monks with no order and with no discipline; that thou keepest women away from the monastery," etc., etc. A Benedictine reformer of 1503 lends his support to the same accusation, repeating St. Bernard's words (Bernard, Ep. 254; Guido Juvenalis Reformationis Monastice Vindicie, Paris, 1503, fol. 17a). Cromwell, who fixed this number of twelve, is thus held up to the scorn of the modern reader, simply because he was familiar with an important monastic principle which the Abbot President of the English Benedictines happens never to have met with in his studies.

M 24. Vol. I, p. 333-4. Cardinal Gasquet's description of an ordinary monastic visitation, purporting to be taken from Nicke's Norwich Visitations as a typical example, is grossly misleading all through, and in some cases flagrantly inaccurate. I have already pointed out the falsehood of the assertion that the Bishop always meted out stern punishment to serious faults against good morals (Monastic Legend, p. 3, cf. p. 96, here below); and here is another assertion which can be met equally briefly. "The monk of generally anxious temperament" (writes the Cardinal in describing Nicke's reports) "eases his conscience by the declaration that in his opinion everything is going to the dogs (omnia patiuntur ruinam)." My notes on Nicke's Visitations enable me to test, by comparison with actual fact, this attempt to put a jesting construction upon serious and responsible testimony. This actual phrase occurs only once in Nicke's Visitations (Westacre, p. 104), where Richard Anger first testifies that "omnia edificia dicti prioratus patiuntur ruinam," and Richard Cobbe, following him, repeats "omnia patiuntur ruinam." On more than fifty other occasions monks apply the word ruinam to their monasteries: in every case the context shows the reference to be to actual dilapidation of buildings or possessions. To take the first two instances: "aedificia patiuntur ruinam magnam" (St. Faith's, p. 19), and "propter ruinam et destructionem in domibus" (St. Benet's, p. 63). In many cases the witnesses give further details, e.g. 75 (Norwich Cathedral) "monasterium in nonnullis locis (viz. ecclesia, domitorio, domo capitulari) patitur ruinam in tectura plumbea." Nobody who had read these Visitations with the least care, could fail to see that the word ruina is there used literally, and that these records testify to widespread mismanagement and dilapidation in the monasteries, long before the Dissolution. It must be remembered that the preamble to Henry's Act of Suppression lays almost as much stress on this waste and dilapidation, as on the accusations of immorality brought against the monks.

V 25. Vol. I, p. 344. The Cardinal translates fatentur "they are reported," apparently taking it for some part of fari. If this blunder on the part of the President of the Vulgate Revision Commission seems intrinsically incredible, let it be compared with Nos. 34, 36, 60, 61, 64, 69, 71, 89, 90, 109, 110, 122, 166, here below. These, again, should be compared with similar ignorances of the Vulgate text, (though not of the Latin language) which are quoted from a distinguished Jesuit professor in my "From St. Francis to Dante," 2nd ed., p. 356, note 7. Few priests know their Vulgate so well as a capable Sunday-school teacher knows the English version; and these lapses on the part of distinguished Roman Catholics would cause far less surprise to their own colleagues than to the general public.

DD 26. Vol. I, p. 344. (Bury St. Edmunds.) Cardinal Gasquet, professing as usual to quote literally from Dr. Gairdner's Calendar (Vol. X, no. 364), makes Cromwell's visitor write "There is a grave suspicion that the abbot and convent had agreed together not to tell anything about themselves, for though report says the monks here live licentiously, still there never was less confessed to" [italics his]. The reader who verifies his reference will find that he has here garbled his extract; Dr. Gairdner's words run: "though no monks are more notorious for licentious living, yet there was never less confessed." And Dr. Gairdner is true to the original, which runs "nam, ut nusquam alias licentiosius aut insolentiosius vivunt monachi quam illic, ex communi fama, ita nusquam minus confessum quam ibi." Dr. Gairdner, (who, as a Scotchman, knew something of Roman law), was aware of the legal signification of communis fama, which is defined by medieval canonists as " the general testimony of credible people in the neighbourhood." The Cardinal (who, as will presently be seen, is sometimes extraordinarily ignorant of canon law) mistranslates this phrase communis fama into report, italicizes the word, and thus transforms the correct legal phrase of the Visitor into the complaint of a baffled scoundrel. Yet it is a very common complaint among orthodox Visitors of the Middle Ages that the monks conspired together to conceal the truth; ecclesiastical authorities legislated frequently against this, but with small success. A distinguished medieval abbot actually boasts in his chronicle, how he and his fellows thus successfully shielded their grossly immoral superior against the Bishop.[1] The most orthodox of visitors, in cases where the monks' silence was inconsistent with the communis fama, drew exactly the same inferences which Cardinal Gasquet abuses Cromwell's agents for drawing at Bury St. Edmunds.

D. 27. Vol. I, p. 369. A monk of Wigmore, John Lee, accused his abbot to Cromwell of various offences. Froude prints his letter in full, and (as is often the case) goes decidedly too far in the inferences he draws from it.

After correcting Froude's inaccuracies, Cardinal Gasquet undertakes to justify the Abbot, from the injunctions given by the Bishop's commissary appointed to visit and enquire into the case. Of these injunctions, he gives his own version fromthe MS. register at Hereford. Let me here translate five paragraphs from these injunctions (Reg. Fox, Heref., fol. 21a), which Cardinal Gasquet manipulates to support his thesis. It must be premised that he suppresses No. 2 altogether: how he deals with the rest, can only be understood by a comparison of the Cardinal's " summaries " on p. 369 of Vol. I, with these following translations:

(a) " First, considering that the lives of prelates ought to provide a model of living to their subordinates (since a prelate cannot, with any free face, rebuke in others that which he approves in himself), we strictly enjoin and command thee, beloved brother and Suffragan,[2] in virtue of holy obedience, (that so thou mayest live as an example of good, religious and laudable life to thy brethren the canons), that thou be careful to avoid the companionship of any suspected women whatsoever, and of those in especial (if any there be) with whom thou art ill-famed [notatus] of incontinent intercourse, under the penalties lately proclaimed against incontinent [clerics]; and know that, if in this matter thou obey not our injunctions, thou wilt forthwith incur these said penalties, without further warning from us."

(b) " Item, we command thee not to dissipate, waste, or consume the lands, chattels, possessions or other goods of the monastery, but rather to employ them to the uses of the monastery; nor to farm out or alienate the same without the consent of the Chapter."

1. This is the well-known Evesham Chronicle in the Rolls Series; I have given full references on this point in the English Historical Review for January, 1914, p. 37.

2. The Abbot was also a Bishop Suffragan; Bishop Fox is therefore bound to address him with all consideration. Cardinal Gasquet deduces from the phrase " if any there be," presently following, " that no case had been proved against him, appears tolerably certain." It is scarcely necessary to observe that this phrase is a piece of " common form," frequent in medieval documents, like the cautious " be they more or less," of our own lawyers.

(c) " Item, that thou inform thy brethren whether thou hast redeemed the jewels pawned by thee in times past ; and, if not, that thou redeem them now and restore them to thy monastery, under the penalty decreed against embezzlement." (Then follow what Cardinal Gasquet calls " the usual regulations for the yearly accounts and for the custody of the monastic deeds " ; the fact being, that such regulations are found in medieval visitatorial injunctions only where suspicions of mismanagement or dishonesty have been excited by the visitation.)

(d) (Addressed to the Canons) " Item, seeing that it is most indecent that a man polluted with the stains of lechery should offer sacrifices (hostias) in the House of God, therefore We, wishing that chastity, as the gem of all other virtues, may shine in the Religious who dwell under Our care, do decree, command and enjoin upon you Canons aforesaid, all and severally, that ye keep your chastity in all things, and that each one of you do keep it, avoiding utterly the company of all women whatsoever, except in the cases permitted to men of Religion, under the penalty above rehearsed."

(e) " Item, since that part is base which agreeth not with the whole [whereof it is part], we solemnly command that Richard Cubley[1] do bear himself religiously in morals, in monastic uses, in dress, in conversation, and in honesty ; that he be present in choir at the day and night services together with the other brethren ; moreover, that he abstain from hawking, hunting, quarrelling, fighting [pugnis], and all suchlike unlawful occupations."

Cardinal Gasquet, after giving a version of these injunctions so garbled as to rob them of all real significance, adds triumphantly " Thus, after a careful examination, little appears against the character of Wigmore and its abbot, John Smarte. The visitation really discredits the charges and base insinuations of John Lee." It is only by carefully comparing his version with these actual translations, (as I have said above), that the reader can realize his methods of dealing with unpublished evidence.

28. Vol. I, p. 470. Cardinal Gasquet ends this volume, and his review of the very doubtful characters whom Cromwell employed to report on the Monasteries in 1535, by asserting that " no other evidence is forthcoming " beyond the untrustworthy word of these men.

This is simply " the thing that is not." The orthodox Gascoigne, in 1450, had written of the monasteries in words quite consistent with Henry's accusations in the Suppression Bill. Pecock, set up specially to defend the monks among other clergy, could do so only half-heartedly : even Sir Thomas More's words would often seem half-hearted to a modern apologist ; and More's friend, Colet, " had but very little liking for monasteries," because " those who took [religious orders] did not come up to their profession."

But let us accept the Cardinal's own limitation, and take official documents of the sixteenth century only. Nicke's visitation of 1514 reveals a state of things which no modern government would tolerate (Monastic Legend, p.). It will presently be seen that Archbishop Lee's York visitations, if the Cardinal had left them ungarbled, would have told much the same tale. Others of his omissions, as the reader has seen, are simply caused by his anxiety to conceal similar evidence. Lastly,

1. The Abbot's chaplain, whose misdeeds Lee had accused the Abbot of abetting or overlooking.

the Cistercian abbot of Combe, somewhere about 1515, appealed to the General Chapter to reform the English houses. Let them decree, (he said) " under the strictest censures and pains, that, before the year be past, the entering and frequenting of women within the monasteries of our Order be shut off ; for otherwise the honesty of Religion and the monks' observance of their Rule will never be well thought-of, seeing that this thing causeth, and hath caused, the ruin of many ; for, as we think, this abuse hath grown more inveterate among us than in any other nation."[1]

Cardinal Gasquet may reasonably excuse himself for never having met with this important letter ; but he would find it difficult to justify his ignorance—or rather, his elimination—of the other evidence unfavourable to sixteenth century monasticism.

M 29. Vol. II, pp. 95–6, 221–4, 500. I deal with these almost incredible blunders about Monastic Schools in the tenth of my Medieval Studies, notes 5, 9, 10, 11, 34.

D 30. Vol. II, p. 220. I have already pointed out how the Bishop of Worcester's letter was so garbled in Vol. I, as to suppress his prophecy that, when the time came for visiting the nunneries, " many faults will be found in them." In the sixth chapter of Vol. II, Cardinal Gasquet developes his case in favour of the nuns. In order, as he says, to give " an insight into the conventual life " of a typical convent just before the Suppression, he quotes the injunctions of Archbishop Lee to the nuns of Sinningthwaite in 1534. He prints four and a half pages of this document, from the MS. register, implying again on p. 219 that this extract is typical, and fairly illustrative of convent life in general at that time. Now, these injunctions, together with the Bishop's other visitations of that year, have since been very carefully printed by Mr. W. Brown for the Yorkshire Archæological Journal (1902, 440 ff.). This publication now shows that (to take no notice of frequent small blunders in transcription and minor omissions, of which some, at least, seem to be dictated by " economy " of truth,) the Cardinal has taken the following liberties with his documents :

(a) Gasquet. " The dormitory door is to be fastened ' until service time,' and the key kept by the prioress."

Original. " That the prioress there, every night, provide that the door of the dorter be surely and fast locked, that none of the sisters may get out until service-time, nor yet any person get into the dorter to them, and that the key thereof be in the custody of the prioress." In the simultaneous and parallel injunctions for the convent of Esholt, (to which the Cardinal himself refers in general terms on p. 219) this injunction is still more significant, for it is followed by the warning " that she suffer not any manner person, of what degree soever he be, secular or religious, to lie or be lodged in the cloister, or in any chamber opening into the cloister."

(b) Gasquet. " From henceforth the prioress shall diligently provide that no secular or religious persons have any resort or recourse at any time to her or any of her said sisters, on any occasion, unless it be their fathers or mothers, or other near kinsfolk." . . . Here the Cardinal breaks off, but the

1. The original may be found in Eng. Hist. Review, January, 1914, p. 39 (note).

Original goes on, "in whom no suspicion of any ill can be thought. In like manner we command and enjoin the said prioress, under pain of privation, that she admits no person, secular nor religious, to her company suspectly, or be in familiar communication with her in her chamber or any other secret place."

(c) Shortly afterwards, without any mark of omission, Cardinal Gasquet suppresses the Archbishop's command "that all sisters sleep in the dorter, under pains and penalties due on this behalf."

(d) Again without warning, he suppresses the following paragraph: "item, we command and enjoin the said prioress and convent, that she nor they admit nor take any person, secular or religious, to be her or their ghostly father, to hear her or the nuns' confessions, without special licence obtained of us or our successors under our seal."

(e) Gasquet. "Also that no one shall be blamed or rebuked for any injunction made at visitation." The word I have italicized must be noted; it necessarily fixes the reader's thoughts upon the Archbishop or his commissaries, who alone did or could make injunctions in this case.

Original. "Also we enjoin and command, under pain of the great curse, that the prioress shall not rebuke or worse intreat her sisters for anything said or done in this our visitation, or shall make any rehearsal thereof, but shall lovingly and charitably intreat them. And in like manner, under the same pain, we command the nuns, that none of them grudge or murmur at the prioress, nor any of their sisters, for anything said or done at this visitation, or make any rehearsal thereof to any sister's rebuke."

Here we have not a word about archiepiscopal injunctions, but, on the contrary, the very great risk (for which medieval authorities legislated with a desperate frequency which suggests their impotence), that witnesses who spoke plainly at a visitation might be persecuted afterwards by their superiors or fellows.

(f) After thus garbling the Sinningthwaite records, Cardinal Gasquet refers vaguely and generally to the contemporary visitations recorded in the same portion of Lee's register, and quotes four paragraphs from the Nunappleton injunctions, giving us to understand that all the evidence is of this same character.

Yet the fact is that the Archbishop was able to visit only five nunneries on this occasion. To four of the five, he gave injunctions identical with, or similar to, those which Cardinal Gasquet has suppressed in the Sinningthwaite case, with all their significant implications. At Esholt, moreover, he found that an ale-house had been set up on the convent premises, and that one of the nuns had lately borne a child. In two letters of the same date as the Sinningthwaite visitation, the Archbishop deals with a prioress of Basedale, who had left her convent and lived "indecenter et irreligiose" among secular folk, then had professed repentance, but finally had returned "fragilitati antiquae." Why does Cardinal Gasquet, while professing to deal so fully with the subject, give no hint whatever of all this? Is it not because, even on his own chosen ground, he cannot afford to put the full evidence before his readers? Even if, under his guidance, we turn our faces away from the whole mass of damning evidence contained in official documents of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries—even if we arbitrarily confine all serious consideration to the first few decades of the sixteenth—even so, he cannot allow his readers to face the actual recorded facts.

31. Vol. II, p. 329. "The learned antiquary, Hearne," is quoted as voucher for the educational activities of the Glastonbury monks. The words are not Hearne's at all, but those of a well-intentioned and very ignorant Roman Catholic antiquary, whose words are clearly distinguished from Hearne's in the book referred to by Cardinal Gasquet, and who produces no evidence whatever for his assertion.

M 32. Vol. II, p. 492. "It is remarkable," writes Cardinal Gasquet, speaking of seventeenth century literature, "that the evil repute of monks and nuns dates from this period." He supports himself merely on a remark of Macaulay's, which will not bear the stress he lays upon it. This has been dealt with in Monastic Legend (p.); but, as readers might feel that this simply leaves them to weigh the Cardinal's judgment against mine, let me here quote the verdict of a modern scholar whose orthodoxy is as unimpeachable as the Cardinal's, and who is attempting to estimate the value of those accusations of vice and mismanagement against the Templars which gave the excuse for their suppression by the King of France and the Pope in 1311. "The literature of the Middle Ages," writes the Abbé Mollat, "whether rightly or wrongly, censures monastic morals crudely and indiscriminately."[1]

COLLECTANEA ANGLO-PRAEMONSTRATENSIA.

(Royal Historical Society, 1904–6.)

These foregoing corrections, confined to a small portion of his book, may show how little the Cardinal's statements can be trusted, even on points where his profession ought to give him most authority, or where he claims to rest upon most definite documents. This weakness comes out even more clearly in these three volumes of his Collectanea Anglo-Premonstratensia, because the necessity of editing and commenting a definite text gives him less opportunities of vague subterfuge, and enables the reader more definitely to check him at every point.

The text of this work is printed from two MSS.: one at the Bodleian, original, and another, since lost, but transcribed by the antiquary Peck about 1750.

33. In dealing with Peck's transcript, the Cardinal corrects some obvious mistakes, but falls himself into others hardly less obvious. On pp. 11, 13, 14 of Vol. I, and in half a dozen other places, he corrects Peck for what he calls (pref., p. XIII) "the not inconsiderable error" of transcribing testimonium where the sense demands witness. This testimonium, therefore, Cardinal Gasquet everywhere alters to testis, in evident ignorance of the fact that medieval writers often used testimonium in that sense (as indeed the modern French word temoin might have sufficed to suggest).

V 34. Vol. I, p. 17. He is puzzled by the phrase in praesentiarum, and hints at some mistake of Peck's. The phrase is quite common in medieval Latin, and occurs even in the first book of the Vulgate (Genesis 1, 20).

1. Les Papes d'Avignon. Paris, Lecoffre, 1912, p. 234. I am not, of course, quoting the author as agreeing with me about monastic morality, but as simply bearing out my assertion of the notorious fact that attacks on monastic morality are among the commonplaces of pre-Reformation literature.

35. Vol. I, p. 129. He criticizes Peck for transcribing capiciorum instead of caputiorum; but the former spelling is very common in fifteenth century documents, and there is not the least reason to doubt that Peck found it exactly as he has written it.

V 36. Vol. I, p. 183. He shares Peck's bewilderment at efferbuit, though it occurs, e.g. in Job xx, 27, and Ezekiel xxiv, 5.

37. Vol. I, p. 238. Se. This, though unclassical, is the normal medieval usage; and it is astounding that the Cardinal should here suggest a mistranscription of Peck's.

38. Vol. I, 239. Repentes errores is perfectly comprehensible; it means "grovelling (or "furtive") heresies," as Horace speaks of sermones repentes. The Cardinal, unable to construe this, is driven to suggest that Peck ought to have written recentes.

39. Vol. I, p. 258. He alters Peck's rubendo to loquendo, where both paleography and sense should have suggested ridendo.

40. Nor is he much more fortunate with his own MS., the original register in the Bodleian. On Vol. I, p. 78, he proposes to change nostrum into vestrum, where the next sentence shows clearly the correctness of the MS. reading: vestrum would spoil the whole sense.

41. Next page, the MS. has "ea que vestre sedant utilitati"; i.e. cedant, a common medieval licence of spelling and a common medieval phrase. The Cardinal would change this to spectant.

42. Vol. I, p. 820. He alters indebitater to indubitanter, where indebitate gives the exact sense required.

43. Vol. I, p. 83. He turns the passage from donati sunt to opponat into nonsense, by two false stops and the running of two words into one.

V 44. Vol. I, p. 85. He amends vobis into nobis, which renders the sentence frankly ungrammatical; the obvious sense is obtained by reading vos.

V 45. Vol. I, p. 121 (note 3). He is unable to construe a perfectly clear sentence, and suggests adding a word which again does violence to the grammar.

46. Vol. I, p. 136 (note 3). He amends a sentence which reads quite correctly as it stands, in order to obtain a different sense which, in fact, would be at plain variance with Canon Law. How could a General Chapter in 1459 decree that no succeeding General Chapter should licence any Premonstratensian to serve in a parish church? A General Chapter can no more bind the decisions of future General Chapters, than a Parliament of future Parliaments. The decree was aimed at the Commissaries of the General Chapter, as its plain words declare.

47. Vol. I, p. 143 (note 1). He first mispunctuates, and then suggests a gratuitous emendation to correct the nonsense thus produced.

V 48. Vol. I, p. 159. Fueret is altered to fuerit, which makes bad grammar ; foret is the obvious correction.

49. Vol. I, p. 221. The change of absolutum to absolutos shows that Cardinal Gasquet has never realized the not unusual medieval concord of a participle when vos refers to one person only. Here, again, modern French might have suggested the facts to him.

M 50. Vol. II, p. 23. Traditoris inde makes sheer nonsense of the sentence : it is of course a blunder of the Cardinal's for traditoris Jude. In a later document this is correctly given : but the original error would have been quite impossible to any scholar really familiar with medieval visitation literature, in which this comparison of a " proprietary " monk to Judas is a stock formula.

51. Vol. II, p. 133 (note 2). The alteration is quite unnecessary : the text construed well enough.

V 52. Vol. II, p. 149. Innotescimus, though here employed in a sense used by St. Augustine, and of which Ducange says " utuntur passim scriptores," proves so incomprehensible to the Cardinal that he again makes a very unhappy emendation.

53. Vol. III, p. 3. Et non solum, etc. These three lines are so punctuated, apparently deliberately, as to make nonsense.

54. Vol. III, p. 4. The suggested emendation makes worse sense than the text. The Cardinal seems not to have realized that hoc may be a neuter ablative of comparison.

55. Vol. III, p. 65. Utendo is here in its common medieval sense of a present participle ; there was not the least need to alter it ; nor the sub of p. 98 to ad ; nor again p. 105, note 2.

56. Vol. III, p. 148. The MS. reads cera (or, we may probably conjecture, ceram). Here again we have a common medieval licence of spelling for seram, which makes the sense required. Cardinal Gasquet alters this to arcam.

57. Vol. III, p. 206. Infra festum Beate Marie. This is a quite common and intelligible medieval phrase ; but the Cardinal changes it to ante festum, etc.

58. On the other hand, while emending texts which are comprehensible enough, he leaves not a few obvious blunders uncorrected. In Vol. II, p. 60, line 11, exharando should evidently be exhonerando. On the penultimate line of Vol. II, p. 62, brachi makes nonsense ; it seems plainly intended for bracei, " malt." On the twentieth line of the next page, a non is required before nisi to make sense. Vol. I, p. 200, line 17, et equo makes untranslatable nonsense, further aggravated by the Cardinal's punctuation ; et e contrario is not only paleographically probable, but would, with a comma after ecclesia, give the required sense.

M 59. Again, Vol. II, pp. 114, 123, 146, the Cardinal thrice prints gravator as the title of a monastic office ; it would be interesting to know what sense he attaches to the word. It is an obvious blunder for granator, (or, more probably granatorius, as it is correctly printed on p. 125) ; this and granatarius are quite common monastic terms.

V 60. Take, again, Vol. II, p. 66, where a certain Robert Wolfet, " a nobis impetitus, premissorum [criminum] aliquid negare non valuit, sed misericordiam anxius imploravit, cui tamen pro rebellione prout infertur xl^{ta} dierum gravioris culpe penitencia sibi injuncta, et emissione per triennium ad monasterium de Tore. Necnon eciam pro incontinencia sua injunximus xl^{ta} dierum gravioris culpe et emissionem per triennium ad prefatum monasterium de Tore duximus subiturum," etc. It is difficult to understand how such a hash as this can be printed without any attempt at emendation, or how the Cardinal would propose to construe it, though of course its general sense is obvious enough.

V 61. Vol. III, p. 200. The text runs " eidem Ricardo purgatione criminis supradicti manum confratrum nostrum induximus." Here, again, it would be interesting to know how the Cardinal proposed to construe this. The obvious sense seems to require purgationem, manu, nostrorum, and indiximus.

62. Vol. III, p. 3. In tantum to peractis is so punctuated as to make nonsense : so again p. 56, line 25. Vol. III, p. 23, line 1, again makes nonsense ; for ultima et read ulterius.

63. To turn now to minor errors : Vol. II, p. 68, line 6, voce should obviously be vocem ; p. 74, line 4, maxima ruina should be maximam ruinam ; p. 127, l. 26, for verei read viridis ; p. 131, line 22, for indignus read indignos ; p. 180, line 16, for extinguetur and reticetur, extinguatur and reticeatur. Vol. III, p. 139, line 4 from end, for perdantur, perduntur ; p. 184, line 5 from end, for providentia, improvidentia ; p. 54, line 2, for sustinuit, sustinuerit ; other words needing correction may be found in vol. II, p. 122, line 15, and p. 127, line 8. No doubt the large majority of these are errors of the medieval scribe, to whose carelessness the Cardinal bears witness in his preface ; but the Editor might well have applied to these passages a little of the ingenuity which he wasted on amending what was already correct. Moreover, I am informed that in some cases the reading which makes nonsense is not even in the MS., e.g. Vol. II, p. 76, indie is misread for inde ; and p. 127, line 26, the MS. has not verei, but via.

V 64. Most unhappy of all, however, is his effort to supply a list of the Biblical references in a letter of Peter of Blois which happens to be copied into the Register (Vol. I, p. 256 ff). In the first eight lines, he fails to recognize two Bible texts (quos elegit, hos predestinavit, and novum indueris hominem), and only succeeds with the third, 1 Cor. xiii, 11. In the succeeding pages he fails to identify the following texts : producat de thesauro suo nova et vetera (Matt. xiii, 52)—Deus non irridetur

(Gal. vi, 7)—usque ad novissimum quadrantem (Matt. v, 26)—ut reddas populum acceptabilem Domino sectatorem bonorum operum (Titus ii, 14) —latere sub modio (Matt. v, 15)—oleo caput peccatoris impinguant[1]— non sumus meliores quam patres nostri (2 Chron. xix, 4).

If it be pleaded that one or two of these are rather allusions than exact quotations, it must be replied that the Cardinal has, in some instances, identified even vaguer allusions than these ; e.g. p. 258, note 3, p. 260, note 1, and 259, note 5, where he ascribes the proverb " Vox populi, vox Dei " to Isaiah lxvi, 6.[2]

Let us now turn from mere blunders to questions of literary conscience. The Cardinal, when he edited this book, knew that he had been publicly accused of gross and palpable misstatements as to the proportion of inculpated Religious recorded by official Visitors, and as to the regularity with which they were punished (Monastic Legend, pp. 4–10). He knew that this accusation had been supported by an array of documentary evidence which constituted, in the words of his own former supporter, Dr. Gairdner, " a powerful indictment " (see above, p. 65). He was therefore, in this Collectanea Praemonstratensia, doubly on his honour (1) not again to minimize the proportion of inculpated Religious, and (2) not to exaggerate again the regularity or severity of their punishment. Yet in fact his assertions are here even farther than before, if possible, from the facts which actually stared him in the face while he was writing. For full proof of this, any reader specially interested in monastic evidence may refer to Appendix III, here below. For the present purpose, it is sufficient to summarize that evidence briefly here.

D 65. Proportion of offenders. The Cardinal only calculates this for Vol. II (i.e. for the monasteries taken alphabetically from A to H), while implying that this arbitrary division is typical of the rest. As a matter of fact, these houses from A to H happen to present a distinctly better record than the houses from L to W, which are thus omitted from the calculation.

In his calculation itself, he counts each Canon afresh at each separate Visitation, thus bringing the total of Canons to 1,806, and the proportion accused of incontinence to one per cent. Yet there were in fact only about 470 Canons visited in these houses ; this brings the real proportion up to nearly five per cent., or considerably more than the percentage which, under Cromwell's visitation, the Cardinal dismisses as incredible.

Again, he speaks as if these figures which he quotes formed an exhaustive record of all that the Visitors discovered " in the quarter of the century." Yet in another place, he is perfectly well aware that a large proportion of the Visitation records of these twenty-five years are missing; and the documents printed in his first volume (of which he here takes no notice) prove that these lost Visitations produced a heavy crop of discovered offences. Lastly, he takes no heed of the fifty-one apostates recorded, many of whom were pretty certainly leading far from model lives outside the convent walls. The real facts of these Visitations, if the Editor had honestly faced them, are amply sufficient to justify Dr. Gairdner's significant palinode: "I fear that there is much to be said about the state of matters in a considerable number of monasteries, to show that they were no good schools of delicacy or chastity." (Nineteenth Century and After, July, 1909, p. 55).

1. Psalm xxii, 5 Vulgate. So utterly is the Cardinal baffled by this quotation, that he prints impingant, which makes sheer nonsense.

2. This verse of Isaiah runs " Vox populi de civitate, vox de templo, vox Domini reddentis retributionem inimicis suis." A reference to the text of Peter of Blois will show that he is simply quoting the common proverb ; it is his introductory phrase " scriptum est " which seems to have misled the Cardinal into the idea that this must be some Biblical text : he, therefore, looks up vox in the Concordance and gives the nearest text that he can find.

D 66. Coming to the question of punishment, the Cardinal writes: "Those found guilty were punished with exemplary severity . . . generally the culprit was actually sent at once to some other monastery." This statement is false even on the face of his documents; in the large majority of cases, the words recording this sentence are followed by a second formula clearly recording that execution was deferred. Moreover, even where the sentence was pronounced unconditionally, a little patience would have enabled the Cardinal to see that it was often disobeyed. The documents themselves prove pretty conclusively that the punishment which the Abbot describes as general, was actually inflicted in less than twenty-five per cent. of the cases. Moreover, there were numerous offences which passed quite or almost unpunished; e.g. a canon who "had lived in an abominable and disorderly fashion," yet escaped with a warning (Vol. III, p. 196); another who had illegally pawned three of the conventual books, and was let off with the recitation of seven psalms, which he could have done in a quarter of an hour, even if his conscience had forced him to do it at all (Vol. II, p. 212). In short, there was as little strictness of punishment among these Praemonstratensians as (to quote one instance out of many) among the Ripon clergy whose doings are analysed in my eighth Study (p. 16). The cases given below in Appendix B are far from exhaustive: to represent the real facts with any fulness, one would have to edit the whole book over again.

D 67. Again, the Cardinal insists that these sentences of banishment entailed a complete loss of rights as members of the community. Here, again, the contrary facts lie on the very surface of his own documents. The first two cases recorded are those of canons who, though sentenced to banishment for incontinence, were actually promoted to higher offices during the term of their sentence, and of whom one became Abbot of the same house which had witnessed his sin.

D 68. These falsifications—for it is impossible to use a milder word—are often cloaked under a similar manipulation of facts in the English summaries which, as Editor, the Cardinal prefixes to each Visitation report printed. It is notorious that the large majority of readers—even of competent scholars—find no time to study the actual text of a book of this kind, but simply follow the preface and the summaries. In a large number of cases where the Cardinal writes that the culprit "is sent" away, the text itself shows that he was not sent; and many other similar misstatements, which can scarcely be accidental, are pointed out in Appendix III.

RULE OF ST. BENEDICT.

(King's Classics, 1909.)

The Cardinal's preface explains that he has based his translation upon an older one of 1638, "although it must be confessed that I have found it necessary to take considerable liberties with the text of the seventeenth century translators." The version thus revised is now styled among the faithful "Abbot Gasquet's translation." (cf. the Abbot of Downside, in Cambridge Medieval History, Vol. I, p. 540, note).

V 69. The Cardinal's worst treachery to St. Benedict is in Chapter XL (p. 74). Here the saint's infirmorum imbecillitatem is translated "the weak state of the sick," thus suggesting that St. Benedict allowed wine to his monks only in the infirmary. Even though Cardinal Gasquet has obviously failed to recognize the phrase as a quotation from Romans xv, 1, which would at once have set him straight, yet a reference to Martene's classical Commentarius in Regulam would have shown him that the medieval commentators understood the Saint's words not of bodily, but of spiritual weakness.

D 70. A few lines lower, the Cardinal takes the liberty of suppressing altogether the last two sentences of this chapter, in which St. Benedict forbids the monks to murmur if they cannot get their daily pint of wine.

V 71. Another curious Biblical blunder occurs in Chapter II (p. 14). Cardinal Gasquet, while slightly altering the seventeenth-century translator's earlier words, quotes St. Matthew as writing "Seek first the kingdom of God, and His justice, and all things shall be given unto you." Yet St. Benedict himself writes quite correctly haec omnia; and it is very difficult to imagine an Anglican prelate printing such a misquotation from the Bible.

V 72. Again, in the last chapter (p. 122) the Cardinal fails to recognize that zelus amaritudinis is as directly taken from James iii, 14, as (for instance) other references to St. Matthew and 1 Corinthians which he identifies successfully in notes 19 and 20.

V 73. Finally, he mistranslates St. Benedict's prayer in the last sentence, rendering "Christ, Who can bring us into eternal life." The Saint's words are: "Christo omnino nihil praeponant, qui nos pariter ad vitam aeternam perducat." Even without the Amen, which follows in many MSS. and editions, the obvious grammatical sense of perducat in this passage is that of a prayer.

THE GREAT PESTILENCE.

References to 1st Edition, 1893. All these following blunders and misstatements are, I believe, textually reproduced in the 2nd Edition (1908), though I had exposed many of the worst, a year before, in the Contemporary Review (since reprinted as No. 8 of Medieval Studies; Simpkin, Marshall & Co., 1/- net).

In this book his main thesis is twofold: (a) that the clergy in general clung faithfully to their posts throughout the plague, and (b) that the Pestilence struck the Church a blow from which she was still reeling when Luther attacked her; in other words, that medieval civilization and morals before 1348 were far purer and better than they were between 1348 and 1518. It will be well, therefore, to arrange the distortions of the evidence under these divisions.

A. Faithfulness of Clergy.

The Cardinal, writing as a partisan, very naturally emphasizes cases which seem to lend themselves to his interpretation, while passing lightly over evidence to the contrary. But he also goes far beyond the limits of honest partisanship, by actually suppressing the most definite evidence against his contention, even while he quotes from its immediate context. The four following explicit assertions of chronicles, for instance, are entirely suppressed by him.

DD 74. G. P., p. 26 (Chron. Padua, p. 626). "Many were buried for money by vile persons, without priests and without candles."

DD 75. p. 27 (Di Tura, p. 123). All fled from the sick: at burial "neither priest nor friar went with them, nor was funeral service said."

DD 76. p. 28 (Parma. Murat. XII, p. 746). "And the sick were abandoned by servants, doctors, notaries, priests, and friars, so that the plague-stricken wretches were neither tended nor healed, nor could they make their wills nor die confessed or absolved."

DD 77. p. 34 (Matt. Nuewenburgensis, p. 261). "Men died without sacraments."

In addition to these, there are several who declare, in general terms, that all men, or almost all men, avoided the sick, who were thus left helpless.

DD 78. p. 37. Again, quoting from Martin's Histoire de France, he omits the whole passage describing how, in many places, "the priests retired through fear, leaving the administration of the Sacraments to a few Religious who were more bold." And on p. 47, having to quote in full from the contemporary chronicler from whom Martin takes this passage, he omits the words I have italicized, puts a comma after Religious, and so distorts the whole sense.

D 79. p. 53. His two quotations from Gilles li Muisis are not only so translated as to exaggerate the chronicler's vague evidence for the numbers of clergy who died in doing their duty, but entirely omits the chronicler's remark that "parsons and chaplains, clerks and sextons, complained of not getting sufficient money" for their duties (lines 407 ff, p. 373).

DD 80. p. 84. The Cardinal, in a long passage designed to show the devotion of the clergy, quotes from the Register of Bath and Wells, but omits the Editor's note pointing out that the Bishop fled to his manor during the plague.

D 81. p. 81. He does indeed let his readers see the Bishop's complaint that " priests cannot be found . . . perchance for dread of infection or contagion " : but, two pages later, he quotes this as proving that the clergy were dying too rapidly for the work to be performed. Now, there was probably one priest to about 145 souls in England before the Black Death ; and statistics tend to prove that priests and people died in fairly equal proportions. There is therefore no apparent reason why the Sacraments should not have been administered, so long as the bulk of the priests stuck to their work. On this subject, the chroniclers, Birchington and Dene, bear most explicit testimony which the Cardinal has taken care not to give in full. " In this pestilence," says Dene, " many (plures) chaplains and curates would not serve without an excessive salary . . . " plures beneficed clergy also, since their parishioners were so diminished by the plague that they could not live on such oblations as were left, deserted their benefices " [deserverunt prints Wharton ungrammatically : we must, of course, read deseruerunt]. Birchington writes " Then also priests were so dear and so few [tanta caritas presbyterorum et paucitas erat] that parish churches remained altogether unserved, and beneficed parsons had departed from the cure of their parishes for fear of death, not knowing where they might dwell." Let the reader compare this with Cardinal Gasquet's words on p. 105, where the evidence of the two chroniclers is not only given very incompletely, but also spoken of as exceptional : these are, " perhaps, the only cases in England." Yet his own documents might have shown him that the Archbishop's encyclical letter was sent to all the dioceses of the Province of Canterbury, with its bitter complaint that the greed of the clergy, who " care not . . . for the cure of souls " unless they can get higher salaries " is giving an evil and pernicious example even to lay workmen." (e.g. Ralph of Shrewsbury's Register, p. 639).

D 82. On p. 204, again, he writes " It is certain that [the Bishops] did not shrink from their duty, but according to positive evidence remained at their posts." To this, let us oppose the actual evidence, supplied by the Cardinal's own documents. The Pope " shut himself up in his own chamber, with great fires continually lighted, and gave access to no man " (Matt. Nuewenburgensis, p. 261). The Bishop of Bath and Wells, as we have seen, fled to one of his manors. The Bishop of Rochester remained at two of his manors, never visiting his cathedral city. Finally, the Archbishop of Canterbury " after perfunctorily visiting the dioceses of Rochester and Chichester, then dwelt in his own manors, wearying his flock by numerous citations " (Birchington, in Anglia Sacra, vol. I, p. 43). From all these chroniclers the Cardinal has quoted passages in the immediate context of this unfavourable evidence which he so deliberately blinks in this place.

DD 83. p. 206. G. " It is interesting to note that in normal times very few were ordained after their appointment as incumbents." He supports this astounding misstatement by an argument based upon only forty-four cases, taken from a single town : compare this with the statistics of about 1,200 cases from four different dioceses, which I have given on pp. 19, 20, of my " Priests and People Before the Reformation " (Medieval Studies, No. 8). The wider generalization shows that the Cardinal's crude generalization from forty-four cases is wrong by some 1,600 per cent. Indeed, (considering that he confessedly quotes from MS. records which his readers cannot verify,) it seems extremely probable that he has blundered over his figures ; if we reversed those figures, putting each under the opposite category to which he attributes it, this would give a fairly normal result.

B. Civilization shattered by Black Death.

D 84. p. 37. Cardinal Gasquet quotes from a chronicler who speaks of the deterioration after 1348 ; but he omits the passage in which this deterioration is described as only transitory.

D 85. p. 54. He paints social life before 1348 in glowing terms, professedly quoting all the while from Siméon Luce. It would be tedious to quote all his distortions of Luce's evidence ; but here are two examples :

G. " The general population of France . . . was equal to what it is in the present century." This startling assertion omits Luce's all-important qualification " en exceptant les grandes agglomérations urbaines "—which, in Normandy alone, (of which Luce is especially speaking), amount to nearly two millions and a half of people : i.e. about half the total population.

G. " Numerous villages were scattered over the face of the country, every trace of which has now disappeared." Luce, " nous y voyons [avant 1348] des villages nombreux, plus nombreux même qu' actuellement sur certains points."

D 86. p. 106. The Cardinal attributes the poverty of two particular nunneries to the Black Death. His reference to his own chosen authority shows that this chronicler traces their poverty, on the contrary, to " longstanding mismanagement "—malam diutinam custodian. (Dene, p. 377).

D 87. p. 179. He quotes the poverty of Canterbury Cathedral as solely due to the Black Death. Yet the contemporary Dene of Rochester, who is more than once cited in this book, attributes this mainly to Papal extortions, simony, and the mismanagement of the monks themselves. (Wharton, Anglia Sacra, vol. I, p. 367).

D 88. Again, there are many cases where the Cardinal's own authorities expressly attribute the plague to God's vengeance for the wickedness already prevalent in the world before 1348. The most briefly emphatic, perhaps, is the Rimini chronicler, p. 285 (Gasquet, p. 27). " Man's iniquity, and sins of every kind, had so multiplied upon earth, that their stench and the cry thereof came to the just ears of the Almighty." Abbot Gilles li Muisis of Tournay writes equally strongly, but far more diffusely, pp. 334–364. Other witnesses are Knighton (ed. Twysden, col. 2,600) ; Magnum Chronicon Belgicum, p. 328 ; Boccaccio, Decameron, Giorn. I ;

De Mussi (Haeser, p. 54) ; Paduan Chronicler (Murat, vol. XII, p. 626). To all this inconvenient evidence the Cardinal pays no attention, though he quotes from its immediate context.

C. MERE BLUNDERS, with no intention of bolstering up any thesis. (Italics, as usual, are mine).

V 89. p. 20. The Cardinal translates " no prayer was said, nor solemn office sung, nor bell tolled." The original runs " non preco, non tuba, non campana." Praeco occurs seven times in the Vulgate, and is regularly spelt preco, of course, in medieval documents.

V 90. p. 120. G. " The world is placed in the midst of evils." He is here translating from a chronicler who, quoting from 1 John v, 19, writes correctly " mundum totum quasi in maligno positum." It becomes still more evident that Cardinal Gasquet has failed to recognize this Biblical quotation, if we compare his words with the Douay version : " the whole world is seated in wickedness."

91. p. 20. G. " The father or the wife would not touch the corpse of child or husband." The chronicler says the contrary, that others would not touch the corpse, so that parents and spouses were obliged to put it in the coffin themselves.

92. Ibid. G. " Without rite or ceremony." Original : " brevi ecclesiastico officio."

93. p. 26. G. " Appealed in vain." The original chronicle says the contrary, that, whether for love or for money, all succeeded.

94. Ibid. G. " Hardly a third of the population was left." Original : " forsan in comitatu tertia pars defecit "=" perhaps a third died."

95. p. 28. G. " By rote." Original : " pro consuetudine."

96. p. 46. G. " It never entered a city or town without carrying off the greater part of the inhabitants." Original : " a paines s'en partit sans emporter toute la ville."

97. p. 48. G. " Villages." Original : " castris," i.e. towns.

98. p. 106. G. " As is thought, from the present age to the Day of Judgment they can never recover." Original : " quod, durante isto seculo, usque ad diem judicii creditur ea non posse reparari. Seculum is of course here in the common medieval sense of world : " so long as this world lasts."

99. p. 120. G. " I add parchment to continue [my chronicle]." His original has " dimitto pergamenam pro opere continuando, si forte," etc., i.e. " I leave some parchment blank."

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN ENGLAND DURING THE 14th AND 15th CENTURIES.

(Cath. Truth Society Pamphlet.)

In this essay, one of Cardinal Gasquet's main arguments is that the people must have been well taught from the pulpit, because the prelates, in their provincial or diocesan synods, repeatedly enjoined that the priests should thus regularly teach the people (pp. 8 ff). Yet it is a well-known canon of historical evidence that this wearisome reiteration on the part of lawgivers is usually an indication not of general obedience, but of general disobedience to the command so reiterated. As Cardinal Gasquet himself says in another book, where his argument requires it, " the constant repetition of the royal commands, addressed to all parts of the country, as well as the frequent complaints of non-compliance with the regulations are evidence, even if none other existed, of the futility of the legislation." (Great Pestilence, p. 197).

But, it may be said, in this particular matter we lack the second factor which would conclusively prove the futility of the legislation ; we have indeed some " constant repetition," but no " frequent complaints of non-compliance." This is, indeed, the impression carefully conveyed by the Cardinal's treatise ; but only because, while quoting from the immediate context, he has deliberately and repeatedly suppressed the evidence of non-compliance.

D 100. His first quotation, for instance, is from Archbishop Peckham's celebrated constitution of 1281. This runs : " The ignorance of priests casteth the people into the ditch of error ; and the folly or unlearning of the clergy, who are bidden to instruct the faithful in the catholic faith, sometimes tendeth rather to error than to sound doctrine. For some blind ones search not always those places which are most known to need the light of truth, as the Prophet saith : " The little ones have asked for bread, and there was none to break it unto them," and as another Prophet crieth : " The needy and the poor seek for waters, and there are none ; their tongue hath been dry with thirst " (Lam. iv, 4 ; Is. xli, 17). Wherefore, in remedy of these dangers, we order that every priest having charge of a flock do, four times in each year, . . . instruct the people," etc., etc. Incredible as it may seem, Cardinal Gasquet begins his quotation only at the words here italicized, without the least warning of omission. He not only suppresses, but silently suppresses, the more important half of his own witness's testimony ; the evidence which, by itself, would suffice to knock the bottom out of his whole argument. Nor can he plead that these despairing words of Peckham are isolated or peculiar. Other prelates had publicly said or implied the same thing before 1281, though Cardinal Gasquet takes no notice of their evidence. Stephen Langton's constitutions of 1222 imply that some of the parish clergy could not even read the Canon of the Mass, and that others were " dumb dogs " (Wilkins, vol. I, pp. 586, 589). Cantilupe of Worcester, in 1240, published an injunction with implications almost as damaging (ibid., 669 ff.) ; so did St. Richard of Chichester in 1246 (ibid., 693) and Bishop Walter of Durham in 1255 (ibid., 704). In 1287, Bishop Quivil of Exeter, following out Peckham's policy in somewhat fuller detail, gave as his reason " lest both pastor and people fall into the ditch " (ibid., vol. II, p. 144). Moreover, nearly all these wearily reiterated injunctions about pulpit-teaching, throughout the Middle Ages, repeat also (explicitly or implicitly) the famous accusation brought by Peckham against his clergy in 1281.

For this legislation of 1281 was that on which succeeding medieval injunctions were based ; Cardinal Gasquet himself points out that " the constitutions of Peckham are referred to constantly in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries as the foundation of the existing practices in the English Church." But he takes good care not to point out that Peckham's damning preamble, Ignorantia Sacerdotum, was echoed also down the centuries to the very Reformation period. Even in 1518, we find Cardinal Wolsey proclaiming in full synod to his Province of York " the ignorance of the priests casteth people into the ditch," etc., etc., down to the last word of Peckham's arraignment. Wolsey, in short, takes care to emphasize all those facts which the Cardinal now so laboriously conceals from his readers ; all those facts which would compel us to amend his phrase " existing practices " into " existing theories." For Wolsey, in his own individual preamble, specially excuses himself for now republishing so many time-worn constitutions, on the ground that they had not been kept in the past (Wilkins, vol. III, p. 662). It is difficult to understand the mentality of an author who, carefully omitting this, can go on to write on p. 8 : " But, was this law faithfully carried out by the clergy, and rigorously enforced by the Bishops in the succeeding centuries ? That is the real question. I think that there is ample evidence that it was." It is only by the most systematic garbling of his own authorities, that he has managed to excape from his own canon of criticism laid down in the Great Pestilence. (1) He garbles the question of " constant repetition " by showing his readers only just enough to colour the contention that medieval prelates always kept religious instruction in view ; while at the same time concealing the wearisome frequency with which they were compelled to reiterate their predecessors' injunctions. (2) " Frequent complaints of non-compliance," again, though conspicuously absent from the Cardinal's quotations, are conspicuously present in the documents upon which he professedly bases himself. Here, therefore, we have " evidence, if none other existed, of the futility of the legislation." The theory that priests should teach their flocks from the pulpit, at least four times a year, was as partially realized as most other medieval theories.

D 101. Nor are these the Cardinal's only falsifications in this brief treatise. On p. 9, still bent on proving how well the priests taught their flocks from the pulpit, he quotes from Archbishop Thoresby's little catechism drawn up for the province of York in 1357. Here, again, he suppresses the principal and most direct evidence, beginning for that purpose in the middle of a sentence, and garbling the opening words in order to disguise this liberty he has taken with the text. The words he has omitted run thus. The Archbishop begins : " Seeing that some of those Christians over whom we are set, however unworthily, are not instructed (whereat we grieve) even in the rudimentary [grossis] and necessary points of Christian doctrine, which [defect] is said to be caused not only by our neglect (not to say ignorance) but also by the neglect of ignorance of rectors, vicars, and parish priests, who ought to instruct them according to that duty of the cure of souls which we have taken upon us ; by reason whereof (though God forbid !) a way may easily be opened for errors and for grievous peril of souls : We therefore, willing (as is our bounden duty) to bring some healing remedy thereunto, through the counsel of our clergy,[1] have thought fit thus to ordain : That each rector, vicar, parish chaplain, or other curate, do openly," etc., etc. ; the rest following pretty nearly as in Cardinal Gasquet's version.[2] After this suppression, the Cardinal has no difficulty in convincing unsuspecting readers " that this duty of giving plain instruction to the people was not neglected up to the era of the Reformation itself " (p. 11).

102. For the above-cited contention he then undertakes to produce " ample evidence," which amounts to no more than this, that in the later Middle Ages many manuals were drawn up to assist parish priests in their teaching work. He attempts no critical examination of these books ; and some of those which he glibly quotes (e.g. the Liber Festivalis) would, in fact, give results by no means flattering to medieval religious education. The very unfavourable evidence as to preachers which he has suppressed from his Dives and Pauper quotations, will be shown in the examination of his Eve of the Reformation.

THE EVE OF THE REFORMATION (1900).

In this, and in some later books, the Cardinal professes to quote a good deal from early printed books of very difficult access ; and many of his soi-disant quotations show an appalling lack of literary conscience, which is emphasized by his habit of withholding adequate references. I have pointed out how, on the subject of " the Open Bible," the Cardinal makes Sir Thomas More say the opposite of what that great man says in fact (Medieval Studies, No. 7, p. 77). Again, in quoting from Dives and Pauper, a rare fifteenth-century printed book, he never once gives any reference ; but leaves his readers to search through the whole folio volume. With kind help from a fellow-student, I have, however, run all his quotations to earth. Quite apart from his habit of modernizing whole words and phrases (including some perfectly familiar to all Bible readers), only one of these quotations (p. 300) is unmarred by omissions from the immediate context, or by actual (though unacknowledged) suppressions, some merely careless, but others with evident intention.

D 103. G. p. 284 (D. and P., Com. V, chap. 10). The Cardinal, who is striving to prove how well the duties of teaching and preaching were fulfilled by the pre-Reformation clergy, omits one of the opening sentences of this passage, which runs as follows, " also men of holy church slay men and women ghostly of God's word and of good teaching "—i.e. kill men's souls by withholding due religious instruction.

1. So writes the fourteenth-century paraphraser ; the Latin original shows the Archbishop to have intended " with the approval of our Provincial Synod." There is no ground for Cardinal Gasquet's implication, perhaps unintentional, that the original suggestion came from the parish clergy themselves, and not from the Archbishop.

2. The original is printed in Lay Folks' Catechism, E.E.T.S., 1901, pp. 3 ff. A comparison of this text with Cardinal Gasquet's reveals several obvious errors of transcription in the latter.

104. G. p. 297 ff. What the Cardinal presents to us as a fairly continuous passage is in fact taken from different parts of the book. The first two fragments are from Com. III, chap. 19. Then comes a quotation of which the Cardinal only tells us that it occurs " later on, under the same heading." It comes in fact twenty-three pages lower down, under quite a different heading (Com. IV, chap. 11–12); and even within the passage actually quoted, the Cardinal makes two separate omissions, unacknowledged to the reader, though of no great importance in themselves.

D 105. p. 355. This brief quotation, professing to be single and homogeneous, is really an extraordinarily garbled version of fragments from two different chapters, not even put together in their proper order (Com. VII, chaps. 12 and 14). It would be impossible to represent the carelessness with which the thing has been done without reprinting too much of the original text for any reader's patience. Moreover, while seeking hither and thither in these two chapters for words which seem favourable to the Church as a charitable institution, the Cardinal carefully omits more than one passage in which the author speaks most bitterly of the riches and uncharitableness of many clergy. Dives, for instance, asks on the second page of Chapter 12 " it seemeth by thy words that men of Holy Church which spend the goods of Holy Church in wicked use (as in pomp, pride, gluttony, lechery and in other vanities) be thieves." To which Pauper (who represents the official teacher in this dialogue) replies " That is sooth . . . Men of Religion, monks and canons and such other that use great riches of silver and gold . . . more pompously than lords, be strong thieves and do great sacrilege, so spending the goods of Holy Church in vanity and pride, in lust of the flesh, by which goods the poor folk should live. A lady of a thousand mark by year can pin her hood against the wind with a small pin of latten, seven for a penny. But a monk, that is bounden to poverty by his profession, will have an ouch or a brooch of gold and silver, in value of a noble or much more." With the help of this and similar omissions, the Cardinal succeeds in making his author testify quite favourably for the medieval church.

D 106. Moreover, apart from this treatment of the context, even in the passage actually quoted, he makes the following unacknowledged alteration, which decidedly softens the author's accusations against neglectful clergy:

G. " Therefore they prefer to leave their own sins openly reproved generally, among other men's sins."

Original (in modern spelling). " And therefore liever they have to lose the souls that Christ so dear bought, than to hear their own sins openly reproved generally among other men's sins." This case may be a mere blunder, like his substitution of St. Anselm for St. Austen in the same passage, and his translation of " charged " (i.e. valued) as " discharged," which makes nonsense: but the Cardinal's similar omissions in other cases can scarcely be merely accidental.

D 107. He shows as little conscience with the Sermo Exhortatorius of W. de Melton, on which he lays great stress, but, as usual, without vouchsafing adequate references (pp. 149–153). This very rare little treatise, read as a whole, strongly corroborates Wolsey's and Colet's complaints as to the prevalent ignorance and carelessness of the early sixteenth century clergy. Yet the Cardinal, by picking out the preacher's pious exhortations to his ordinands, and suppressing most of his implications that such exhortations were foreign to the majority of the actual clergy, completely misrepresents his testimony. Here, for instance, are some omitted passages. "Ye will not, I trust, come up promiscuously, according to the usual practice [ut solet fieri], or insolently or waywardly or wantonly, as claiming admission [to holy orders] from the examiners, by some unlawful law" (fol. 1 b). If you find yourself ploughed, "beware of [uttering] any insolent, opprobrious, or contumelious word" (fol. 2b). Do not rely upon external pressure exercised upon the examiner, since such illegal pressure "is so pestilent that, unless it be altogether extinguished, the church will never be freed from its multitude of uncultured and foolish clergy" (ibid.). Later on, he speaks of ordination by bribery of examiners or their clerks, and by false representations as to age (fol. 5a, b), remarking that this last at least was common (saepe). Finally, he exhorts the ordinands with great earnestness to avoid "that ravening and pernicious plague of covetousness, whereof almost all priests are much accused and noted among the people" (fol. 6b). It is obvious how vital these points are to any true estimate of the pre-Reformation clergy.

D 108. Moreover, the Cardinal's crooked methods become even more obvious at the point where his summary becomes so full as almost to equal the original in bulk: e.g.

Original (sig. A, iiij r°). "Everywhere, throughout towns and country places, rude and rustic priests abound; partly busying themselves with servile and sordid labours, partly giving themselves up to taverns, swilling [ingurgitationibus], and drunkenness; some cannot get on without women[1]; others spend their whole day playing at dice and hazard and suchlike pastimes; others spend their time in the vanities of hunting and hawking; and thus they spend a whole life of utter idleness and irreligion [vitam irreligiosam], even to extreme old age."

G. p. 151. "Both in towns and country places there are priests who occupy themselves, some in mean and servile work, some who give themselves up to tavern drinking; the former can hardly help mixing themselves up with women, the latter employ their time in games of dice, etc. Thus do they spend their whole lives to extreme old age in idleness and non-religious occupations."

We have here, of course, a virtual translation, complete in every particular except the one essential of fidelity to the original.

V 109. And the blunders are as remarkable as the infidelities; e.g.

Original (fol. 3a). "Qui, grammaticalium litterarum expertes et inopes," etc., etc.

G. p. 150. "Who, though skilful in grammar," etc., etc. Expertes, it may be noted, is here in the nominative, so there can be no excuse of confusion with expertos. Not only is expers a regular catch for fifth-form boys, but the word also occurs in an important verse of the Vulgate

1. "Hii mulierculis carere non possunt; isti," etc., etc. Muliercula, by this time, had at least as uncomplimentary a connotation as wench: nor will the words hi and isti bear the special limitations which the Cardinal tries to impose upon them.

(Heb. v, 13). The translation of the whole passage is far from scholarly ; but I confine myself in this record to the more conspicuous blunders.

V 110. Original (fol. 6b). " Contra hunc indignum torporem et fastidiosam desidiam."

G. p. 152. " Against unworthy sloth and foolish desires." Though desidia does not occur in the Vulgate, desiderium occurs more than fifty times.

D 111. On p. 438, the Cardinal quotes from a rare little book by Bishop Gardiner. Here he does, indeed, vouchsafe a reference, but it is wrong ; the actual words occur not on fol. 2 but on fol. 5a. And, after the word trumpery, the Cardinal has taken his usual liberty of suppressing a dozen lines of the original without any mark of warning, and altering the next sentence in order to disguise his omission. The omitted lines would have revealed Gardiner's inconvenient assertion that the friars' traffic in indulgences had amounted " to thus buy and sell heaven," with the result that " both the merchandise is abhorred, and the ministers also ; we cannot away with the friars, nor can abide the name [of friar ?]." Under cover of this suppression, the Cardinal writes " In the literature of the period, it must be remembered, there is nothing to show that the true nature of a ' pardon ' or indulgence was not fully and commonly understood. There is no evidence that it was in any way interpreted as a remission of sin, still less that any one was foolish enough to regard it as permission to commit this or that offence against God " (p. 437).

D 112. In order to write the foregoing sentences, the Cardinal is compelled not only thus to garble his own documents, but to turn his face altogether away from the Oxford Chancellor, Thomas Gascoigne, whose Liber Veritatum is one of the most important original authorities for The eve of the Reformation. Gascoigne's evidence is quoted fully in the eighth of my Studies, p. 8 ; one sentence may suffice in this place. " Sinners say nowadays [i.e. about 1450 a.d.] ' I care not what or how many evils I do before God ; for I can get at once, without the least difficulty, plenary remission of any guilt or sin whatsoever through an Indulgence granted me by the Pope, whose written grant I have bought for fourpence.' " Gascoigne, it must be noted, was as unimpeachably orthodox as Gardiner, and hated Wycliffe as bitterly as Gardiner hated Luther.

D 113. p. 145. Sir Thos. More is quoted as " categorically denying a charge made by Tyndale against the clergy in general, and against the Popes for permitting so deplorable a state of things in regard to clerical morals." In the passage from which the Cardinal proceeds to bring a very partial quotation, More does not categorically deny Tyndale's accusations against the clergy in general. He tacitly admits (what other orthodox medieval writers confess in so many words) that it was not uncommon for bishops and archdeacons to wink at clerical incontinence for the sake of the revenues which they themselves derived from the sin ; this he tacitly admits, and only pleads that the universality of Tyndale's accusation " falsely belieth many " bishops and archdeacons, and that the " evil demeanour " of others must not be imputed to the law, but to the frailty of human nature (p. 619). In an earlier passage (p. 224 ff), his defence of clerical morals in general is even less "categorical." Not only does he write generally: "I wot well the whole world is so wretched that spiritual and temporal everywhere all be bad enough; God make us all better!" but he also expressly admits one of the heaviest counts in Tyndale's accusation, the prevalence of clerical incontinence in Wales, saying: "but truth it is that incontinence is there in some places little looked unto, whereof much harm groweth in the country" (English Works, p. 231). If the Cardinal had ventured to print More's words in full, the admissions of that distinguished apologist would be found far more destructive of the thesis maintained in The Eve of the Reformation, than anything which can be quoted from him in support of it.

Moreover, Tyndale's accusation of habitual incontinence against the Welsh clergy is directly supported by Gascoigne, who asserts that the contemporary Bishop of St. David's positively refused to countenance the reform of clerical morals in his diocese, because the fines levied from erring priests brought him a yearly sum which, in modern money, would amount to more than two thousand pounds. (Liber Veritatum, ed. Rogers, pp. 35–6).

D 114. p. 148. The Cardinal asserts, with Dr. Brewer, that a certain document published on p. 470 of Vol. II of the Letters and State Papers of Henry VIII constitutes a testimonial to London morals in the year 1519. The reader who troubles to hunt this reference down, not stopping at Brewer's interpretation but reading the actual document for himself, will find that it shows the Bishop of Winchester to be harbouring, in his "liberty of Southwark," more prostitutes than were to be found in all the rest of the city and the suburbs together.

D 115. p. 43. The Cardinal, in pursuance of his thesis that the Religious Orders kept up their interest in learning to the last, argues that "the Visitations of the Norwich Diocese, (1492–1532), edited by Dr. Jessopp for the Camden Society, contain many references to the monastic students at the university." He quotes two instances which he leaves us to take as typical, but without giving any page-references; the student can check him only at the expense of great waste of time. And the net result is this, that Westacre, which the Cardinal represents as typical with its three monks at the university in 1520, is (I believe) the only monastery which is reported at any time to have so many: even the great Cathedral Priory at Norwich had sometimes none at all, although it was bound by statute to maintain two (e.g. pp. 7, 266). Westacre was bound to pay for one of its brethren at the university; but this duty was not performed in 1514; and only one of the five recorded visitations is free from the complaint that studies are being neglected within the monastery itself (pp. 50, 104–5, 165, 251). The other case which the Cardinal quotes as an instance of monastic love of learning is that of Butley. This house, in 1514, allowed one of its monks to go to the university at his own friends' expense; so far the Cardinal quotes correctly; but there he stops. A reference to the other visitations of Butley will show that, on every other occasion, it is complained of for its neglect of due monastic education. On four of these occasions it had neglected to send a single monk to the university; and on two it had not even a single person within its walls who was able or willing to instruct the younger brethren in Latin (pp. 54, 132, 178, 217, 289). The Cardinal's assertion that, later on, the house itself paid for a scholar at the university, seems to be a pure figment, like some other assertions for which he gives no chapter or verse. Moreover, it may safely be said that, of all the references to the university throughout these Norwich visitations, at least two-thirds are cases in which the monasteries are recorded not as fulfilling, but as neglecting, even their statutory obligations to send one or two monks to study. I have pointed out how strong is the visitatorial evidence on this point, from many sources, in the tenth of my Studies, p. 32 : the facts lie on the very surface of the documents. It is most significant that the Cardinal's inaccuracies are most flagrant where he is professedly quoting from rare books, or where, by withholding references, he has rendered the task of verification extremely laborious.

PARISH LIFE IN MEDIEVAL ENGLAND (1906).

116. Here, again, are many quotations from Dives and Pauper, but without a single indication to guide the student through the whole folio volume. Of the fourteen quotations, only three are free from blunders or infidelities. In more than a dozen places, the Cardinal prints thing instead of the ymage of his original, evidently mistaking the y for a th, and reading the rest carelessly. In another place, he prints things again for the tithes of his original. There are a few omissions which seem merely careless, but others which are evidently dictated by convenience ; not understanding his original, he has simply left out the puzzling phrases without warning.

117. For example, " as they come to honde without chose " (G. 12 ; Dives and Pauper, Com. VII, c. 13). where chose=choice. On p. 161, erynge is quietly omitted twice, and motynge once, evidently for the same reason (Dives and Pauper, Com. III, c. 7). On the same page, the for heuenly mede of the original becomes for heaven made in the Cardinal's transcript, and makes sheer nonsense. On p. 180, another silent omission is evidently due to the puzzling word skyl (i.e. skill, reason) (Dives and Pauper, Com. I, c. 4). Finally, he prints spectacles for the curious steracles of his text, though the next three lines make it plain that this is a misprint for miracles (G. 249 ; Dives and Pauper, Com. III, c. 17).

D 118. Other omissions, however, equally furtive and disguised, are evidently dictated by " economy " of truth. On p. 32, passages are omitted which show that a good deal of medieval church building and ornamentation was not only " perhaps," (as the Cardinal puts it), but actually done rather in a spirit of vain glory and worldly rivalry than out of pure devotion. " For the people nowadays," writes the author of Dives and Pauper, " is full undevout to God and to Holy Church, and they love but little men of Holy Church, and they be loth to come in Holy Church when they be bound to come thither, and full loth to hear God's service. Late they come, and soon they go away. If they be there a little while, them thinketh full long. They have liever to go to the tavern than to Holy Church ; liever to hear a song of Robin Hood or of some ribaldry than to hear mass or matins or any other of God's service or any word of God. And, sithen that the people hath so little devotion to God and to Holy Church, I cannot see that they do such cost in Holy Church for devotion nor for the love of God. For they despise God day and night with their evil and wicked living and their wicked thewys " (i.e. manners: Com. I, c. 51). What an " economy " lies in the omission of this passage, and the Cardinal's introduction of that delicate " perhaps " into his own summary from Dives and Pauper!

D 119. The same motive, apparently, has dictated certain omissions (partly unnoted) on p. 247. The original (Com. IV, c. 11) asserts " But now men say that there should no lewd folk entermit them of God's law [i.e. presume to busy themselves with the Bible], nor of the Gospel nor of Holy Writ, neither to con it nor to teach it." This would be very difficult to reconcile with the Cardinal's theory as to the free use of the vernacular Bible among the laity before the Reformation.

D 120. p. 249. Several lines are here omitted without warning and the text is garbled to disguise the omission. They show that the miracle plays, for which the Cardinal in his text has nothing but admiration, were sometimes, in the judgment of his author, " medled with ribaldry or leasings." (Com. III, c. 17).

V 122. p. 179. Dives and Pauper quotes the well-known Passion Sunday hymn quite correctly as " O crux ave, spes unica." The Cardinal, with equal violence to his text and to Latin metre, prints it as " ave crux, spes unica." (Com. I, c. 4).

In the appendix to the eighth of my Medieval Studies (Priests and People before the Reformation) I have exposed a good many further misstatements in Cardinal Gasquet's Parish Life; these need therefore only be mentioned briefly here.

D 123. p. 238. Peacock, a careful antiquary, is cited as authority for the absurd contention that the ale drunk at Church Ales was " hardly an intoxicant." In fact, he says precisely the contrary.

124. p. 159. Thoresby's Constitution of 1367, far from being " the first order " of its kind, was one of the last: it had been preceded by eleven others, (from 1229 onwards), and was succeeded by only one. This vitally affects the Cardinal's argument.

125. p. 17. Speaking of the appropriation of parish churches by monasteries, he writes, " The grievance of which so much has been made is an academic rather than a real one, and one of modern invention rather than one existing in the Middle Ages." The grievance is, in fact, exposed in language of extreme bitterness by church councils of the Middle Ages, stares us in the face from the episcopal registers, and is described in 1450 by the Oxford Chancellor, Gascoigne, in language which few, if any, modern writers have equalled in vehemence.

D 126. p. 84. He describes the hospitality exercised by the clergy in words which are contradicted by the very documents on which he professedly relies. Moreover, where Lyndwood says "ought to be better endowed" the Cardinal translates this into the tense of fact, "were better endowed"; and on p. 85 he translates "divitibus et pauperibus" as "sick and poor" with equal advantage to his thesis.

D 127. p. 62. In quoting from Bishop Quivil's Constitutions he omits, without warning, a sentence which throws a lurid light on the irreverent behaviour of medieval worshippers in church: "whereby grievous scandal is generated in the church, and divine service is often impeded."

D 128. p. 207. He quotes Quivil's Synod of Exeter as "laying down the law of the Catholic Church on the point [of marriage]; no espousal or marriage was to be held valid unless the contract was made in the presence of the parish priest and three witnesses." This is not only directly contrary to the words of the document from which it is professedly taken, but also betrays an astounding ignorance of Canon Law, and even of so common a phenomenon as the Gretna Green marriages of comparatively recent times. A boy of fifteen and a girl of twelve might, in the Middle Ages, contract a valid marriage wherever they liked, without help of church or priest or witnesses.

129. p. 20. "That on the whole [the duty of paying tithes] was cheerfully complied with in the Middle Ages, would appear to be certain." The contrary of this is the constant theme of medieval clergy on the one hand, and medieval satirists on the other. In Church Synods of all centuries, the irregularities and unpopularity of tithe-paying are among the most frequent subjects of complaint.

Further misstatements, for which I had no room in the above-cited Study, are as follows:

130. p. 7. "To 'Holy Mother Church' all were the same, and within God's house the tenant, the villain, and the serf stood side by side with the overlord and master." This is false. The squire or the "advocatus" had many rights within the church which others lacked; and pews were often hired for money, as in our own day.

131. p. 47. Nothing but extreme archæological ignorance could attribute this picture of a church interior to the "fourteenth century." Didron's Annales, from which it is taken, date it correctly as sixteenth century.

132. p. 67. He derives porch "from the Latin porta." It is of course from porticus.

133. p. 68. A quotation from Myrc is limited to children. This is wrong: Myrc here speaks expressly of all the parishioners, which puts a very different face on the evidence.

134. p. 72. "In the diocesan registers, also, episcopal dispensations de defectu natalium are frequent, and show that a not inconsiderable number of the English clergy sprang from the class of 'natives' of the soil, or serfs, upon whom the lord of the manor had a claim." This assertion, though there is no acknowledgment, is evidently borrowed from E. L. Cutts, Parish Priests and their People, p. 130. Both fact and inference are false.

(a) The phrase de defectu natalium does not refer to serfs, but to illegitimates; not only is it thus glossed by Van Espen (Jus. Eccles, index, s.v. natales) and regularly used in this sense in the Episcopal Registers, but two Papal Bulls to Bishop Grandisson, of Exeter, place the matter beyond a doubt. In 1349, Clement VI granted to Grandisson the right to dispense with fifty clerks or scholars defectum natalium patientibus and in 1353 Innocent VI gave the right of dispensing with twenty more (Register, ed. Hingeston-Randolph, pp. 147, 150). The popes do not contemplate the possibility that any of these seventy persons will be of servile origin: the bulls clearly explain that the dispensations are all for illegitimates, and the first bull even divides them into categories; thirty are to be sons of unmarried folk, ten of married folk in adultery, and ten sons of priests; a most significant apportionment considering that the priests did not form anything like one-fifth of the total adult male population of the diocese—poll-tax returns show them about one in forty, at the most liberal computation.

(b) Moreover, the Cardinal's Canon Law is here altogether at fault; no ecclesiastical dispensation was needed to ordain a serf; it was simply a question between the serf and his master. If the man had not been manumitted, no ecclesiastic could ordain him without injustice to his master; if, on the other hand, he was already a freedman when he came up for ordination, then no further dispensation was needed; a freedman had as much right to seek ordination as a man born free; in other words, the ordination question with the serf was no question of birth, strictly speaking, but of present status: the law is put very clearly in the Summa Angelica, s.v. Servitus, sect. 3, 4. Episcopal Registers do sometimes record the manumission of serfs (which misled Cutts): but these events are very rare in comparison with the others. For instance, Stapeldon's Register (a.d. 1307–1326) records only one such manumission (p. 163), while it records fifty-three dispensations for illegitimates, of whom eight were sons of priests. Stapeldon's successor, Grandisson, amid his very numerous dispensations for illegitimates, manumitted only six serfs in all his forty-two years (1327–1369). Facts like this are all the more important, because the Cardinal owed much of his authority among scholars, until a few years ago, to his implicit claims of great familiarity with the Episcopal Registers.

D 135. p. 73. The Cardinal, while conveying two other passages from Cutts without acknowledgment (pp. 132–3: cf. 278) falls into the blunder of ascribing Piers Plowman's Creed to the author of the Vision, and takes the liberty of omitting some inconvenient lines from his quotation.

136. p. 76. This quotation again is conveyed without acknowledgment from Cutts (p. 133), reproducing its peculiarities of spelling and the blundering omission of two words.

137. p. 77. "The ordinary course [at the Universities] was lengthy": on the next page Cardinal Gasquet computes it at eleven years. Dr.

Rashdall, on the contrary, points out that " large numbers of students—probably the majority—never proceeded even to the lowest degree " ; i.e. to the Baccalaureate which could be obtained in three years (Univ. of Europe, Vol. II, pp. 595 : cf. 584). Dr. Rashdall, to whom I pointed out this and the following page of the Cardinal's book, has no hesitation in characterizing them as " very misleading." We may work out the proportion statistically from the Episcopal Registers. The Mastership of Arts required only seven years of study ; yet in early registers M.A.'s were only a very small proportion to the rest of the parish clergy. To take the diocese of Exeter ; Bishop Stapeldon's Register (1307–1326) records only seven masters in 232 livings. Even a century later, Bishop Lacy (1420–1455) records only 237 masters among the 2,733 institutions to benefices ; and eighty-one of these were deans or canons of great churches ; the remaining 156 amount only to about one master for every seventeen clergy. The Hereford diocese gives a far lower percentage : Trillek (1344–1361) records only thirty-eight masters among 7,032 ordinations ; (or, to take the priests alone, four masters among 1,741 ordained priests).

D 138. p. 78. " They would have to prove themselves to be sufficiently lettered and of good life before they would be accepted for ordination." We have seen that the Sermo Exhortatorius ascribed the " multitude of uncultured and foolish clergy " to the neglect of proper strictness in examination (No. 106 here above). Colet, in his famous sermon before Convocation, spoke even more plainly : " there is the well of evils, that, the broad gate of Holy Orders opened, everyman that offereth himself is all-where admitted without pulling back. Thereof springeth and cometh out the people that are in the church both of unlearned and evil priests " (Lupton's Life of Colet, p. 300 : the word people, of course, means " multitude "). It is noteworthy that the Cardinal, who quotes from or alludes to Colet nine times in his Eve of the Reformation, completely ignores this famous sermon, which contradicts all his main contentions throughout the book.

139. pp. 77, 83. The implications that benefices were rarely given to clerks in lower orders, and that rectors were priested at least within a year of their presentation, are false to the plainest evidence from the Episcopal Registers. From an analysis of more than 700 institutions, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, it transpires that more than 30 per cent. were presented to livings before they had even reached the subdiaconate.

D 140. p. 84. The Cardinal appeals to a MS. Visitation of Exeter diocese in 1340 as containing " many references to the hospitality kept by the clergy." This visitation has since been printed (Eng. Hist. Review, 1911, p. 108). It contains only two notices of hospitality among the ninety churches visited—i.e. just those two cases which the Cardinal selects as " instances " of the " many " which might be cited—and, even in one of these two cases, the visitors report that the former hospitality has now ceased. There are two other minor blunders in the half-dozen lines which he devotes to this subject : the date is wrong, and " divitibus " is rendered " sick."

141. p. 88. The matrix ecclesia of Wilkins's Concilia (Vol. II, p. 160) is translated parish church. It means, of course, cathedral.

142. p. 92. "The assistant priests, known as Curates (curati)." This is a patent anachronism; curatus, by itself, is equivalent not to the modern English curate but to the French curé, (i.e. incumbent), in medieval Latin.

143. p. 112. "The office [of parish clerk] was often held by a married layman." No quotation or reference is vouchsafed, and it is extremely doubtful whether one could be given. The Cardinal is pretty evidently misled by the fact that the parish clerk, being only in minor orders, was sometimes a married man.

144. p. 146. The Cardinal has blundered over his quotation from Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight: he takes ho for a masculine pronoun, and so transfers line 1308 of that poem from the lady to the knight. The line really runs "Ho dos hit forth," etc. The Cardinal similarly makes nonsense of a line of Piers Plowman, on p. 153, by printing mate for mete, and much worse nonsense of another on p. 184 by repeated misspellings, transpositions, and omissions.

145. p. 167. His summary of the Sarum statute of 1319 omits the fact that the disorders at Boy Bishop processions had resulted in "grievous damage both to persons and to the church"; and on p. 180 his summary from Lyndwood disguises the fact that Lyndwood speaks of "tumultuous talking in church or outside." (Ed. 1679, p. 99).

146. p. 198. "All, rich and poor, noble and simple, on coming to the Sacrament of Penance, were treated alike." On the contrary, church synods constantly speak of the abuse of selling absolution in the sacrament of penance for money. Quivil's Exeter synod, from which the Cardinal has quoted half-a-dozen lines before, shows that the evil was serious enough to need vigorous repressive measures: and the almost contemporary Winchester synod bears the same testimony (Wilkins, Vol. II, p. 294). Again, in Piers Plowman, from which the Cardinal quotes almost as freely as from Quivil, there are constant references to the extortion of money for absolution; and Chaucer refers to it more than once.

147. p. 201. This professed verbal quotation from the Synod of Exeter degenerates, in the fourth and sixth lines, into a paraphrase which shortens the original by something like two lines, and which disguises a second clear implication that priests were accustomed to sell the sacrament of Extreme Unction for money (see No. 146, here above). Moreover, it stops short just at the point where the Bishop describes the curious semi-pagan superstitions which impelled some parishioners to refuse Extreme Unction altogether. (Wilkins, Vol. II, p. 135 : cf. 295).

148. p. 203. "It was, moreover, a positive law of the church that every priest should go at once on being called to a sick person, no matter what time of the day or night the summons might come." Not only does the actual text of the Exeter synod, thus garbled by the Cardinal, suggest that this law was imperfectly obeyed; but in the almost contemporary Chichester synod we find the Bishop fulminating against transgressors who "as some [priests] have hitherto presumed to do, send their deacons to the sick with the Holy Eucharist, while they themselves are busied with potations or with other delights of the flesh." (Wilkins, Vol. II, p. 170, sect. 16: see also No. 151, here below).

149. p. 205. "What this ['cyphus pro infirmis'] may have been is not quite clear, but probably it was the dish in which the priest purified his fingers." The same Exeter synod which prescribes this cyphus describes its use clearly also; it was for giving the sick, at their last communion, a draught of unconsecrated wine, in place of the consecrated wine which Catholic practice now denied to the laity.

150. p. 204. The references to "two lanterns instead of the one" shows equal ignorance of this Exeter synod, which clearly prescribes two lanterns.

D 151. p. 206. Bishop Grandisson "had heard that some carelessness had been noticed" in carrying the viaticum to the sick. Compare these words underlined with the tone of Grandisson's actual letter (Reg., p. 787). He writes "we are shaken with pain of heart, and filled with bitterness of horror; . . . many (plerique) rectors . . . as we are made aware by daily scandals . . . bear themselves with the extremest irreverence" (nimis irrereventer se exhibent ultra modum). We must never, of course, fail to allow for medieval vehemence of speech; but it requires some courage to claim this letter of Grandisson's as proving the care ordinarily bestowed upon this sacrament in the Middle Ages. (See No. 148, above).

152. p. 245. "Labour was lightened and the burdens of life eased by co-operation on an extensive scale. A common mill ground the corn, and the flour was baked into bread at a common oven." The ignorance which can plead the common mill and oven as instances of beneficent popular co-operation, is simply astounding. They spelt not popular co-operation, but capitalist monopoly; mill and oven were not the people's, but the lord's, who too often used his monopoly to grind the faces of the poor. Among all the grievances which the French peasantry enumerated before the Revolution, this of the common mill and common oven came quite in the front rank.

English Monastic Life (1904).

The whole book is vitiated by the author's habit of describing the theory rather than the ascertainable facts. Quotations from disciplinarians who describe what monastic life should be, are too often substituted for the evidence of chronicles and visitations which tell us what it actually was. And here, as in his Parish Life, the Cardinal scarcely vouchsafes a single reference from beginning to end, even where he could have actually economized space by referring to a definite page of a definite book, instead of tantalizing us with "according to one English Custumal," "says a writer in a late number of the National Review," "one sixteenth-century authority states," etc., etc.

M 153. p. 23. "A smaller hall, called . . . the 'spane,' at Peterborough." This word spane is simply a blunder adopted from earlier writers; the hall was, in fact, called le seyny: see Lincoln and York Arch. Soc. Reports, Vol. XXXII, p. 92, note 300.

M 154. p. 24. "The soup or pottage, which formed the foundation of the monastic dinner." This is wrong; the generale, and not the potagium, formed the pièce de rêsistance of monastic dinners.

D 155. p. 70. "The sacrist, as one of the English Custumals has it, 'should be . . . careful in keeping the brethren to traditions.'" The original has revocatione, 'recalling' (Chron. Abendon, Vol. II, p. 374), a word of very different significance; and the difference is fully borne out by such monastic records as have come down to us.

156. p. 75. "'The pudding-wife' on great days to make the pastry." The medieval pudding had nothing to do with pastry, as a reference to the N. E. Dictionary will show. The institution of "pudding-wife" was in fact one of the channels through which monasteries utilized even the refuse of their kitchens, instead of giving it to the poor. Just as the very bones were sometimes sold and accounted for, so the entrails were made up into puddings, for home consumption or for sale, by these women. The Cardinal seems dimly aware of this, however, on p. 211, where he quotes a case from St. Edmundsbury but gives no reference.

D 157. p. 79. "A caritas, or extra glass of wine." The Caritas, like the pittance, was only occasionally an extra allowance of wine; and, even then, the quantity was not such as could fairly be described as "an extra glass." So far as the Cardinal's slipshod want of references permits us to judge, he is speaking on this page of the Abingdon customs. At Abingdon, we are expressly informed, the caritas measured nearly three quarts; and on high festival days each monk had half this amount of wine (nearly three pints) for dinner, and the same amount of mead for supper. At Evesham, the caritas was of exactly the same capacity. (Chron. Abendon, Vol. I, p. 346; Vol. II, p. 399: Dugdale-Caley, Vol. II, p. 30, col. 2).

V M 158. p. 146. "The monk, it must be remembered, was in no sense 'a gloomy person.' . . . In fact, the true Religious was told to try and possess angelica hilaritas cum monastica simplicitas." Apart from this startling Latin, the whole implication conveyed by these sentences shows an equally startling ignorance of the writings of monastic disciplinarians. See Chap. VI of my From St. Francis to Dante (2nd ed., p. 63), and the quotations from medieval sources in the eleventh of my Studies. (Book II, chap. vi).

159. p. 148. "Of course manual labour, that is, the working in the gardens, or fields, or workshops of the establishment, always occupied at least a part of the working hours of every monastery, and frequently a large part." This is quite false, except at exceptional times of fervour and discipline. It is idle to quote the ancient Cluny constitutions, when we have the direct evidence of Peter the Venerable that they had fallen into desuetude even before 1150 (Migne, P. L. tom., 189, col. 1036–7), and when even Peter's reforming energy contented itself with reviving them

" to a certain extent." It is very rare, indeed, to find evidence for Benedictines or Austin Canons working in the fields after the twelfth century; yet these (with the Friars, who never pretended to do manual work after the first few years of Franciscan fervour) formed the overwhelming majority of medieval Religious. A frequent entry in monastic accounts is " to John So and So for mowing the cloister-garth " ; or " wages to the hired gardeners " ; and monastic apologists of the later Middle Ages are sometimes found arguing away the rule of manual labour altogether ; cf. my eleventh Study, Book II, chap. 2 ; or Thomas Waldensis, Doctrinale Fidei, lib. IV, art. ii, cc. 24, 31.

D 160. p. 156. The next twenty pages profess to sum up the evidence derived from a nunnery account-book—Grace Dieu, a.d. 1414–1418. Without references, it is almost impossible to trace all his assertions ; but the following cases seem certainly wrong :

p. 171. " Made under good sound cloth by their own hands, or at least under their own direction." None of the entries which I have found in the MS. bear this out (P.R.O. Ministers' Accounts, 1257-10) ; and certainly the more definite repetition of the same implication on p. 175 is false : " they grew the wool and spun it and made it into cloth." In the third year the nuns pay for spinning, just as anyone else might do ; in the fourth they buy sackcloth ready-made ; in the fifth, they pay for the weaving of cloth, and buy some, at any rate, of their spun thread. Indeed, it would be startling, if we had not other evidence of the kind, to note how little manual work these nuns of Grace Dieu did. They hired women for their harvesting (first year), hired a clerk to write their accounts (fourth), bought, instead of making, purses and gloves (second and third) ; had a man to make their tallow-dips. The Cardinal even copies down some of these items, but sums up in the teeth of the general evidence. The cope which they sold for £10 probably was made by some at least of the fifteen nuns ; but we cannot assume this for certain, in the face of frequent records which tell of valuables sold to relieve financial straits.

D 161. p. 175. " They lived, too, within their income." This is flatly contradicted by more than one passage of the account-book, referring explicitly to their debts (e.g. third, fourth, and fifth years). Between the first and second years, comes a long list of debts still owing, some of it " ancient " (de veteri debito).

M 162. p. 175. The corrodies which they paid are spoken of as a work of charity. Yet the Cardinal can hardly be ignorant that the majority of corrodies, in the later Middle Ages at any rate, were frankly pecuniary transactions, the monastery receiving a lump sum or some similar consideration, in return for which it granted to the corrodian a pension in kind, or even in money. There is similar economy of truth in his remarks on p. 170 about the " clothes-money," (or " salaries " as the accountant calls it in another place) of the nuns. This covert form of pocket-money was expressly forbidden by Benedict XII ; but the abuse flourished notwithstanding.

163. There are also several blunders of transcription or translation in the few direct quotations printed by the Cardinal. The ten lines on pp. 165–6 contain three mistakes in the sums of money, and an omission of three lines; one of the two proper names is misread; dī. last albi allecis is translated "house food"; and in feryncicis aquis "at the sluice." The Cardinal was evidently nonplussed by this spelling of forinsecis, which, however, is not so very uncommon. On p. 169, again, what the Cardinal transcribes as "woofing and warping" cloth stands quite plainly in the MS. as weyfyng and walkyng—i.e. "weaving and fulling."

164. p. 177. "John Aubrey, too, writes almost as an eye-witness of the Wiltshire convent." John Aubrey was born in 1626 and wrote in 1659 at the earliest; that is, his book is as far removed from the actual facts which he professes to describe as Cardinal Gasquet's is from the younger Pitt's first ministry in 1784. The whole of this legend about the Wiltshire nunnery is fully discussed in the tenth of my Studies, pp. 16–17.

D 165. p. 187. The abbot did not claim exemption "on the ground that he had been appointed by the Holy See." The actual letter (Grandisson's Register, p. 395) shows that he made a claim far more damaging to the Bishop's disciplinary authority: "quod consuevit esse nostrum monasterium totaliter exemptum et ab omni jurisdictione episcopali fuisse immune." Again, compare the Cardinal's whole version of this Tavistock case, which he gives as an example to prove that "the episcopal powers were very great and were freely exercised," with the extracts and references to the actual documents which I have already given above in the first of these Studies (p. 5, 6). A comparison of his account of the Bodmin visitation on p. 188 with Grandisson's Register (pp. 980 ff) will be equally instructive. It must be borne in mind that no references are given by our author, so that it is not easy for a student to check these cases unless he knows the registers fairly well.

M 166. p. 194. "Not only did the monks furnish the ranks of the secular priesthood with youths who had received their early education at the Cloister School or at the almonry"—

Very few children were educated in these almonry schools, (which did not usually contain more than a dozen scholars,) or at the choir schools, which were still smaller and less numerous. "Cloister schools" for outsiders, (as so high a Roman Catholic authority as Père Mandonnet admits,) were "rare and short-lived" at all times, and "no trace of them remains" in the later Middle Ages (see his testimony in the tenth of my Studies, p. 36). Against this handful of pupils who thus owed their education to the monks, we must set the complaints of the Oxford Chancellor, Gascoigne, in 1450. It is (he says) the appropriation of so many parish churches to the monks, who render no services proportionate to the income thus absorbed, which lies at the root of "the destruction . . . of learning, and good counsel, and good example, and hospitality, and providing poor youths with the means to go to the university." (Liber Veritatum, p. 3). The same complaints are repeated with equal emphasis on pp. 106, 195, and Gascoigne ends up: "thus perisheth learning and true clergy!" It must be remembered that Gascoigne is one of the best and most accessible authorities for fifteenth-century church life, and that his statements are borne out by official documents, which the Cardinal altogether ignores in this context.

M 167. Ibid. "But the churches and vicarages of places impropriated were the special care of the religious." On the contrary Gascoigne (p. 114) asserts that, through the appropriation of parish churches to monasteries, "the churches are ruined, the cures are ruined, and the value of the living is ruined." The author of Piers Plowman speaks with bitter scorn of "Religious, that have no ruth though it rain on their altars" (B. X. 313). In that visitation of parishes in Exeter diocese, to which Cardinal Gasquet appeals as saying what in fact it does not say (Parish Life, p. 84; see here, above, No. 137), the appropriated churches reported on by the Bishop's visitors show just twice as many dilapidations as the non-appropriated churches; and, in two cases, it is actually reported that rain falls on the altars of these churches from which all the great tithes went to the monks (Eng. Hist. Review, Jan., 1911, pp. 112 and 120, nos. 8 and 52). Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson has arrived at a similar result from an independent study of the existing church fabrics. He writes: "It is noteworthy that, of the numerous beautiful chancels of the early fourteenth century which are to be found in Lincolnshire, Notts, Derbyshire, and the adjacent counties, not one is to be found in a church which, during this period, was appropriated to a monastery." (Lincoln and York Arch. Soc. Reports, Vol. XXXII, p. 65).

M 168. p. 212. "All these [women servants for monks] were selected with care." Here, again, the Cardinal only indicates the theory as expressed in the Custumals, without making any attempt to estimate the practice, as indicated in the records of official visitations. These records show that the women-servants frequently gave occasion for scandal. They crept into the monastic system when the monks gave up their earlier ideal of handiwork—that is, at least as early as the thirteenth century. From that time forward we find laundresses and other women-servants within the precincts, until at last even the Cistercian houses found it almost hopeless to struggle against this "ingressus et frequentia mulierum" (Eng. Hist. Review, Jan, 1914, p. 39, note 62).

M 169. p. 242. "[The Pied Friars] had but one house in England, at Norwich." They certainly had one in London also; see Stapeldon's Register, introduction, pp. xxx and xxxi; cf. Piers Plowman's Crede, line 65.

Abbot Wallingford. (1912)

An attempt to clear Wallingford and the monks of St. Albans from the accusations rehearsed against them by Cardinal Morton in 1490; accusations which may be found fully and correctly translated, (except that the weary catalogue is abridged towards the end,) in Froude's Henry VIII, chap. x.

170. pp. 2, 3. The Cardinal asks us to stand before the great altar-screen of St. Albans and think of "the man who built it, Abbot Wallingford," and take it as our "leading principle" "that art is a finer and more subtle expression of the inmost soul even than words." Yet very little knowledge of the Middle Ages is needed to remind us that Wallingford "built" that screen only in the sense that he ordered it and paid for it. The latter part of the argument would, to St. Bernard or St. Francis, have seemed frankly pagan; if we are to canonize Wallingford on the strength of the altar-screen, we must attribute still greater sanctity to nearly all the petty tyrants of the Renaissance, who did incalculably more for art than he.

D 171. p. 3. "Quite recently we have been asked to change our estimate of William of Wallingford." This is flatly false. Some years before 1490, a fellow-monk deliberately handed him down to posterity as a liar, perjurer, and thief. The Cardinal tries to prove that this accuser was not really Abbot Whethamstede, though the document not only bears his name but is also marked with his very peculiar mannerisms; and, here, he can plead the authority of Riley, no great scholar. But this cannot touch the main point; the fact remains that Wallingford was (rightly or wrongly) written down a rascal four centuries before any of us were born.

172. These instances, just cited from the first few pages, give a measure of the whole book: it is written for a particular public, which looks no farther than whatever the Cardinal chooses to say. We are twice referred pedantically to "MS. Cotton. Nero. D. VII" for well-known documents which have often been printed, and which the Cardinal quotes elsewhere from those printed sources (pp. 14, 17). Giraldus Cambrensis is referred to by page without the volume (p. 3); three notes on pp. 15 and 24 refer us to the wrong books altogether.

V 173. The Cardinal twice mistranslates a very easy sentence, giving the MS. source as his reference, though he has evidently been misled by the mispunctuation of the printed copy (pp. 56, 65). Riley prints "Iam vero hic dicam, palamque monstrabo, quonam, scilicet, pacto per Spiritus Sancti viam in Abbatem postea electus fuerit." The Cardinal, deceived by this punctuation into separating the well-known phrase quonam pacto, translates the former word as that, and connects the second with the latter half of the sentence. Wallingford, he writes, was elected abbot "by unanimous agreement (pacto, per Spiritus Sancti viam)" and again "elected as abbot by acclamation (of the Community, pacto per viam Spiritus)" (pp. 56, 65). For Latin scholarship, this is almost as great a curiosity as the expertes of No. 109 above.

D 174. But, as usual, his worst offences are in suppressions of facts. While professing to summarize the evidence against Wallingford, he omits altogether the damning accusations contained in Innocent VIII's Bull, which accompanied Cardinal Morton's monition to St. Albans. In this Bull the Pope recites how the monks, "in certain [monasteries of the Province of Canterbury] giving themselves over to a reprobate mind, and putting the fear of God behind their backs, are leading a wanton and exceedingly dissolute life . . . to the evil example and scandal of very many folk." (Wilkins's Concilia, Vol. III, p. 630).

D 175. pp. 42 ff. Moreover, in dealing with Cardinal Morton's monition itself, he prefaces and follows it by gross misrepresentations. The document is not a mere "warning to Abbot Wallingford of his [Morton's] intention to apply this [visitatorial] authority to the case of St. Albans." Still less is it true that the accusations contained in the monition are "suggestive of . . . common form" (p. 45); "rather reports" than "charges" (ibid.), or that "their face value is, at the worst, that they remain to this day 'not proven' by any evidence whatsoever" (p. 48). All these statements are as false in canon law as the instances which I have already given in Nos. 26 and 128 above.

A monitio, such as this of Cardinal Morton's, was a regular method of intimating to any cleric that the outcry against him was so strong and considerable as to create a legal presumption of his guilt; and that it now lay upon him to bring sufficient evidence to clear his character (cf. Lyndwood's Provinciale, ed. 1679, p. 127, f and r). That is why Morton, in this present monition, speaks of the scandalum plurimorum; that is why he interlards it with the legal expressions notorie, diffamatus, publica fama, (words which, as will be presently seen, are consistently omitted or distorted by Cardinal Gasquet). In canon law, a man solemnly stigmatized by his superior as diffamatus or infamatus of any offence was a man who had already been condemned by public opinion. He was offered a very lenient process of establishing his innocence by "compurgation"; if he refused, judgment went against him by default. For these sufficiently well-known facts the reader may consult President Tanon's Tribunaux de l'Inquisition (pp. 270 ff and 285 ff) or the well-known medieval manual of canon law called Summa Angelica, s.v. Infamia, sect. 2. As this Summa puts it, "Fama, in the proper sense, is when the whole city or neighbourhood, or the greater part thereof, agrees as to a certain fact . . . It is necessary, in the first place, that it should be founded upon probable conjectures; for otherwise it is not fama in the effective legal sense, but mere popular gossip" [vanae voces populi]. Let us take a concrete instance from one of the earliest pages of a series of records published (with numerous textual errors in the earlier volumes, it may be noted) by a society of which Cardinal Gasquet is a prominent official—the Canterbury and York Society. On p. 97 of the Register of Bishop Hugh of Wells, occurs the following entry, dated between 1215 and 1220. "Roger the Chaplain, presented by the Abbot and convent of Leicester to the church of Eastwell, after an inquisition held by the Archdeacon . . . was admitted and instituted to the same church, on condition that he should serve the said church personally, and that henceforth he should not keep the concubine of whom he hath been hitherto diffamatus, or any other concubine." This was in exact accordance with canon law. Fama, in the legal sense—not vanae voces populi, but the sober judgment of responsible men—had condemned Roger; and the accused had not even ventured to throw himself upon the notoriously over-lenient methods of purgation allowed by the Church. He was, therefore, enregistered to all time as diffamatus, and consequently (in default of legal purgation) as condemned: but the offence was pardoned for this one occasion. Medieval records swarm with such passages; they are especially common in those episcopal registers to which Cardinal Gasquet appeals so frequently and emphatically, yet for which he declines to give specific references when challenged. Wallingford also was notorie diffamatus, Wallingford also made no attempt to establish his innocence from these very definite charges; therefore, in canon law, he was a condemned man.

D 176. pp. 42 ff. But Canon Law is not history; however certain it may be that Wallingford was, in the legal sense, a condemned criminal, we are bound also to consider his case on its own merits; and the Cardinal professes to pass on to this consideration. He gives a summary of Morton's monition far briefer and less accurate than what Froude gave long ago; the comparison is easy to any reader, and will prove most instructive. At the very outset, he garbles Morton's words in a fashion which no ignorance of canon law can excuse. In the first sixteen lines, which profess to be an actual translation, he omits altogether, without the least warning, the decisive legal term diffamatus, the strengthening adjective multorum, and again, on two separate occasions, reinforcing sentences of nearly two lines each. In other words, he has taken the liberty of silently omitting ten per cent. of his text, and in many ways the most significant percentage; moreover, he softens down enormibus into great. The rest, which only professes to summarize, proceeds after the same fashion. He writes "... Then follow a series of the gravest charges against the moral character of one of the nuns of Pray," where the words I have italicized stand for "monialium stupro"; "ad eam et alias ibidem et alibi, tanquam ad publica prostibula." At Sopwell the Cardinal summarizes only the financial, omitting all mention of the graver moral mismanagement recorded by Morton: "whilst thou [Abbot Wallingford] dost depose good and religious women in both convents [of Pray and Sopwell], and dost therein promote the evil and sometimes the corrupted (viliatas) to the highest dignities, Religion is cast aside, virtue is neglected ... so that those convents, once very[1] religious, are now rendered and reputed as it were profane and infamous."

D 177. Moreover, he pays no attention whatever to those words of Morton's which most clearly contradict the theory that the charges rehearsed in this monition were "common form." Once again Morton uses the technical term diffamatus; thrice he uses the almost equally damning word notorie; but of this the Cardinal gives us no hint. And he even omits the sentence in which Morton complains of the terrible scandal which these things are causing among the general public, so that "we are daily besieged and distracted by fresh clamours for the reformation of these things." Lastly, his summary obscures the fact that Morton called on the abbot to give him, within thirty days, a detailed account of such amends as the abbot might have made: of "what thou hast meanwhile bent thyself and striven to effect for the reformation of thine own person, and the persons and morals of thy fellow-monks, and of the priories of Pray and Sopwell and other dependent houses, and for restoring them to the true pattern and rule of thine Order, in accordance with the laudable ordinances and institutions thereof." As if this were not definite enough, let us remember the extreme precision of some of Morton's charges—the very name of the adulteress, with a still living husband, who had been made first nun and then prioress of Pray—the very value (8,000 marks) of the woods cut down and sold, so that "the worldly possessions [of St. Albans], both in real property and in moveables, are notoriously tending to desolation ... to the scandal of very many people; wherefore thou [O Abbot] art clearly seen [dignosceris] to stand in the greatest need of my office of correction and reform ... and so are many of your brethren the monks therein dwelling." And, bearing this in mind, let us pass on to the words in which Cardinal Gasquet sums up his own brief and garbled version: "This is the monitio, or warning; and on the face of the document it

1. Satis religiosa. This is often a puzzling word; we cannot always distinguish between its classical meaning and the frequent later medieval signification which survives in the Italian assai.

professes to be merely the statement of reports, of the gravest nature it is true, but merely of unproved reports against the good name of the Abbot and Convent."

M 178. p. 62. The Cardinal argues " If the condition of the Abbey was really as bad as these rumours would have us believe, the blame must fall quite as much upon Ramridge [the prior] as upon Wallingford [the abbot]." This is contradicted not only by St. Benedict's own Rule, which clearly treats the abbot as the primarily responsible person, but also by frequent records of monastic visitors. For instance—to quote almost at random from a book which the Cardinal ought to remember something about—two of the earlier visitations in his own Collectanea Anglo-Praemonstratensia might have taught him better (Vol. II, pp. 70, 77). And, strangest of all, this very monition of Morton's, which he is professedly discussing all the time, supplies even plainer evidence. It is from the abbot, says Morton, that God will require at the Last Day the blood of these monks who are sinning with his connivance ; there is no word in this context of the prior.

M 179. Equal ignorance, or equal bad faith, underlies the Cardinal's desperate plea that the whole story is too bad to be true. " They [the accusations] are so sweeping and terrible that the whole is suggestive of the equally sweeping common form in which the ' pardons ' previously referred to are couched," etc., etc. (p. 45). He goes on to argue from similar premisses on pp. 46, 59, etc. ; and these assumptions are so important and so demonstrably false that I will deal briefly with them here.

Next to Jocelin of Brakelonde, the Evesham chronicle is perhaps the best-known of English records, unquestionably authentic, dealing with the more intimate side of monastic life. It was written in an age of comparative fervour (early thirteenth century) and by a model abbot, Thomas Marleberge, who had himself played the principal part in bringing to justice the criminous abbot Norreys. The value of his chronicle for our present purpose is increased by the facts that Evesham, like St. Albans, claimed exemption from episcopal jurisdiction, and that the main visitor in both cases was a Papal Legate. Let us, therefore, enumerate the points which Cardinal Gasquet would put aside as scarcely credible, and parallel them from the solemn record which Abbot Marleberge has left to posterity.

(1) Wallingford is defamed of having systematically wasted and embezzled the Abbey property. But Norreys had done so even more thoroughly and openly for twenty-two years, and might have gone on for as long again if he had not quarrelled with his monks. (2) Wallingford is possibly accused of adultery, and certainly of conniving at unchastity in his brethren. Norreys had had children by two married and six unmarried women whom Marleberge was able to specify by name, from among a far longer list of persons unknown ; he also (we are told) would have been glad to see his monks imitate his example. (3) We are asked to discredit Morton's monitio because it merely calls upon the accused Wallingford to reform his own abbey, instead of calling in an outsider to interfere. Yet the Legate had done just the same to Norreys ; and the very book from which Cardinal Gasquet most frequently quotes, the so-called Whethamstede Register, tells us how Brother John Langton, disgraced and removed from Tynemouth by Wallingford in 1478, was by that same abbot appointed Visitor in 1480, to correct the shortcomings of the Tynemouth monks ! (4) But Wallingford (it is argued) received a testimonial from his brother-monks, who supported him in his resistance to Morton. The document quoted in support of this argument contains at least one plain misstatement and one self-contradiction, and leaves its main purpose a matter of pure conjecture ; moreover, it is astonishing how Cardinal Gasquet can describe it as " a categorical denial of many of the evil reports " (p. 58), in face of the fact that it scarcely touches Morton's accusations at any important point. Yet, even if it had been all that he describes and all that he conjectures, it would still be insufficient for his argument. Few pages in medieval history are more startling than that page 121 of this most unexceptionable Evesham chronicle, wherein the model Marleberge coolly relates how he and his fellow-monks swore to stand stoutly by the octogamous villain Norreys, and to hold their tongues even under the Bishop's threat of excommunicating them for their silence, if only Norreys would stand as stoutly by them in resisting the Bishop's authority. If Norreys had kept his part of the bargain ; if he had merely possessed the proverbial measure of a thief's honesty, he might have gone down to posterity with scarcely a spot upon his reputation ; and other visitatorial documents of the Middle Ages simply swarm with similar evidence of deliberate conspiracies to conceal the facts from a visitor. The Cardinal's argument ab incredibili, like his suppressions and falsifications of documents, can only help him with readers ignorant of medieval conditions and content to enquire no further than the Cardinal chooses to take them. The real question is, not what modern monks and modern visitors would do, or what modern dilettantism would expect them to do, but what medieval documents of unexceptionable authority record them to have done in the Middle Ages. Certain psychological riddles suggested by the Cardinal's habitual treatment of medieval documents need not concern us here ; but the fact that he does habitually garble these documents must very closely concern every student of that period. We may successfully misrepresent even the plainest documentary evidence to certain readers, and for a certain period of time ; but, in the long run, a cause which relies upon such misrepresentations must become a cause which appeals only to the thoughtless or the ignorant.

England under the Old Religion. 1912.

A collection of old essays, of which only the first and the last deal with the Middle Ages. " We have fortunately ample material," writes the Cardinal in the first ; and presently wanders off into a series of unvouched quotations, of which less than half are from the " ample material " of actual pre-Reformation documents, the rest being from modern writers often of dubious authority. But the last essay is most interesting, in view of the fact that the Duke of Norfolk has lately claimed as one of the Cardinal's main characteristics " a distaste for controversy " (The Times, June 27, 1914). That last essay was published in 1902, and deliberately republished in 1912. It is, from first to last, a gratuitous and savage attack on certain authors who were in no sense professed medievalists, and of whom the Cardinal might be pretty certain that they would never reply. The Spectator reviewer, in an obsequiously favourable notice of the book, confesses that "most of the essays included are of a strongly controversial nature," and that this final essay, especially, makes the reviewer "take up his pen and his parable in fear and trembling" (April 26, 1913). The Cardinal has in fact never shown any great dislike to controversy where he had no reason to fear retort and exposure. Readers, therefore, must now judge for themselves why he was so voluble in 1902 against two amateur editors who had never attacked him, and why he has remained so silent in the face of repeated accusations of ignorance or bad faith at other times, from critics who have rested their attacks upon plain documentary evidence.

APPENDIX II.

(From the Catholic Times, May 29th, 1914.)

"The Ceremony of the Biglietto. Address by Cardinal Gasquet.

Immediately after the Secret Consistory, says a Reuter's telegram, a small ceremony took place which is called 'Il Biglietto,' or Notice of Appointment. . . . This committee of three handed to each of the new Cardinals in Rome his biglietto, the recipient, in accordance with tradition, appearing much surprised.

Amidst great attention, Cardinal Gasquet delivered a brilliant address in reply, in which he said that he had received the 'immense honour,' as Cardinal Newman called it, without having held the usual positions leading to it, and remarked that he understood that the Pontiff conferred the dignity because of his (the Cardinal's) lowliness. He then continued: . . . . . 'To judge from the letters and telegrams that have poured in upon me during the past few days, my election has been received with pleasure in all English-speaking countries; and it has been a source of the greatest satisfaction to find that this feeling is not confined to the Catholic body. My old friends at the British Museum and the London Record Office—non-Catholics, I think, to a man—and some of the societies like the Royal Historical and the Bibliographical, have expressed their pleasure at an honour given to one whom they regard, so they kindly say, "as one of themselves." From a professor of history in one of the German universities, a Lutheran Protestant, I have heard that in that country they have regarded my elevation as an honour to the historians of the world.'"

APPENDIX III.

Proportion of Criminals and their Punishments in "Collectanea Anglo-Praemonstratensia."

The Cardinal deals with both questions in his Preface to Vol. II, pp. xxii ff. He there professes to sum up fully the Visitors' records of incontinent Religious, and writes: "In all, then, during the last five-and-twenty years of the fifteenth century over which these visitations extend, the records show some sixteen cases of admitted or proved incontinency, and possibly two more doubtful cases. In this period no fewer than 1,806 canons presented themselves, including, of course, several occasions of different visitations, and were examined and interrogated by the visitor during his visitation. Of these 1,806, in the quarter of the century, eighteen at most—that is, barely one per cent.—were charged with any crime whatsoever against morality."

That is, of sexual morality. Yet, even so, the words which I have italicized give a very false presentation of the facts. The records are far from complete for the whole " five-and-twenty years," as the Cardinal himself knows: he has noted in another context (p. viii) that a large proportion of the visitations are altogether missing; and, indeed, this is one of the first facts that must strike any careful student. Moreover, the lists of banished canons published by the Provincial Chapters—fragmentary as these confessedly are—are sufficient to indicate that the missing visitation records were as unfavourable as those which have survived; or, if anything, more unfavourable.[1] Again, it is palpably absurd to count each canon afresh, every third year, as a different man, when the records enable us to estimate their numbers almost exactly. In the houses visited in this second volume (to which the Cardinal arbitrarily confines his calculations), about 470 canons were domiciled at different times during these twenty-five years: therefore not one per cent. but four per cent. of these men were formally accused of incontinence.

But, instead of thus confining ourselves arbitrarily to the first half of the houses taken alphabetically, let us take a survey of the whole. Twenty-nine monasteries were visited in the twenty-five years, containing at any given time about 420 inmates, but, during the whole twenty-five years, about 950.[2] Out of these persons, forty-eight at least were seriously accused of incontinence. The guilt of twenty-nine of these is placed beyond doubt; the large majority were formally convicted, and in the five remaining cases the Visitor treats the evidence as conclusive without further formalities. In twelve other cases, though the records convey a very strong implication of guilt, the Visitor does not press the case to its legal issue, but punishes the accused, or solemnly warns him, as he feels inclined. Only seven of the forty-eight were able to " purge " themselves by those very lenient canonical processes which (as the Oxford Chancellor, Gascoigne, was publicly complaining at this very time) afforded " an occasion of intolerable wickedness " at Oxford, and often resulted in the acquittal of the most notorious culprits.[3]

Moreover, this list necessarily omits such a significant case as Vol. II, p. 211, where the Visitor forbids that, in future, " women suspected of incontinence or of theft should frequent the cloister or other parts [of

1. e.g. the Visitation record of Newbo in 1478 is imperfect, but the Chapter of 1479 sentenced two canons of that house to banishment (Vol. I, p. 148). Of the twenty-six serious cases thus mentioned in these Chapter records, twelve are unrecorded in any other part of the surviving documents; this shows how many accusations recorded by the Visitors must have perished among the records which have not come down to us.

2. Talley, in Wales, was never actually visited: the Abbot was simply summoned on one occasion to come and give his own report. The number of inmates may be counted from the Index, with allowance for cases where the indexer has made a single canon into two.

3. Munimenta Academica, Vol. II, p. 536. The cases are as follows:
Condemned, Vol. II, pp. 36, 66, 76, 78, 97, 117 (two cases), 121, 130, 182 (two cases), 241, 258 (abortion); Vol. III, pp. 7, 16, 18, 38, 112, 115 (the same offender again), 113, 143, 185, 187, 200, 207.
Assumed to be guilty, Vol. III, pp. 30 (two or more), 41 (cf. 39), 162 (two or more).
Not pressed further, Vol. II, pp. 254, 259; Vol. III, pp. 68 (five cases), 104, 115, 185 (two cases).
Purged, Vol. II, pp. 7, 19, 131, 242; Vol. III, pp. 35, 41, 150.

the monastery], or have speech or association (concursum) with the canons, especially those from the town of Barnard Castle." Again, I have taken no notice of the half-dozen cases where the Visitor accuses a canon of "multa enormia" or "abominabilia," without specifying their exact nature. Finally, a large number of other canons are recorded as "apostates"; and there is reason to believe that a considerable proportion of these were living an entirely unmonastic life.[1] Altogether, considering the fact that so many of the visitations of these twenty-five years have perished, it would be utterly unhistorical to treat the forty-eight cited cases as even a remotely exhaustive record; yet, even if we confine ourselves to these, we get a proportion of nearly five per cent. accused of incontinence, instead of the Cardinal's one per cent. It is important, in this context, to remember that Cardinal Gasquet represents Cromwell's Visitors as accusing only 3.1 per cent. of the Religious, and that he refuses to accept even this as a possible proportion. I have pointed out elsewhere that the records of Nicke's first visitation of Norwich diocese give an unimpeachable record of 6.1 per cent. (Monastic Legend, p. 3). If we add to the forty-eight cases actually recorded by the Visitors those twelve other cases of banishment which, in defect of visitatorial records, we happen to know of only through the chapter records, we shall get sixty cases, or rather over six per cent. And when we remember further that chapter records fail us altogether, and visitatorial records to a very great extent, for the periods from 1475 to 1479 and again from 1497 to 1500, it will be difficult to conclude that these Praemonstratensian houses were in a much better state than the monasteries of Norwich diocese.

Again, let us take the question of the punishment of detected offenders. To the historian, this is even more important than the question of the numbers detected, since it enables us to take a measure of the Visitor's energy and authority. If we find him treating the convicted offender with reasonable severity, we shall have some right to infer that he has previously showed a similar spirit in discovering the offender; if, on the other hand, he shows himself embarrassed in his dealings with detected crime, we may rightly suspect him of equal weakness in the preliminary work of bringing hidden crimes to light. There can be no stronger evidence against any system than the record of its helplessness in the face of wickedness and open indiscipline. Bishop Redman, the Visitor in this case, was certainly above the average of his fellows during the years immediately preceding the Reformation; we have, therefore, in these records, a favourable picture of the visitation system. How, then, did Redman deal with his black sheep?

"On the face of the documents" (writes the Cardinal, p. xviii) "which are the official records of the results, it is impossible for the most prejudiced mind not to admit that wrongdoing was never tolerated by the authorities, and that the punishments meted out were sufficiently drastic at least to prove their honesty of purpose." And again (p. xxiii) "those found guilty were punished with exemplary severity . . . generally the culprit was actually sent at once to some other monastery for three, seven, or ten years, to live there without any of the rights belonging to a member of the community. . . . In the face of these documents, then, it is impossible to suggest that the Superiors did in any way tolerate serious abuses."

1. No less than fifty-one are at different times so noted, excluding about twenty more who are accused of "apostasy" in the narrower sense, i.e. of having illegally broken bounds for a more or less brief period. Moreover, a large number of these canons spent their lives in country cures away from the monastery, and were therefore considerably more free from direct visitatorial observation than the rest. It is significant that some of the worst offenders drifted into such country cures.

It would, indeed, be difficult to suggest this, if the crucial words which I have italicized were true. Dr. Gairdner, in the days before he had learned the habit of verifying the Cardinal's references, took for granted the truth of these italicized words, coming as they did from an editor who claimed to be dealing with facts so easily verifiable ; and, trusting implicitly to this assertion, Dr. Gairdner (as I happen to know) was much impressed by this part of the Preface. Yet the Cardinal's assertions are grotesquely, and almost incredibly, false.

I. "Punished with exemplary severity." The total list of grave faults dealt with is about seventy-five ; this includes not only incontinence, but such offences as theft, embezzlement, assaults with murderous weapons, apostasy,[1] rebellion, etc. In at least eighteen cases, the punishments inflicted are almost childish : e.g. a single recitation of the Psalter is inflicted (a) upon three canons who got out at night to haunt taverns, and " returned as dogs to their vomit " instead of amending their ways ; and (b) upon a far worse offence to the medieval mind—actual dabbling in witchcraft. A canon who had illegally pawned three books (which would probably represent a serious embezzlement) was let off with the recital of seven penitential psalms (Vol. III, p. 79, 117 ; Vol. II, p. 212). Another who was " always intent upon consorting and talking with women at recreation-time " had to recite the psalter seven times during the ensuing year (Vol. III, p. 190). An abbot, convicted of incontinence and malversation, was indeed deposed from his office, but at the same time handsomely pensioned for the rest of his life (Vol. III, p. 18). Another even worse abbot was deposed, but no further punishment is recorded (Vol. III, p. 185). Of the third, John Newynton, worst of all, we do not even know that he was deposed, though his canons (apparently without exception) accused him of wholesale malversation of property, drinking and filthy speech in taverns on Sundays and holy days, and " great incontinence with divers harlots and suspected women " (Vol. III, p. 105). For one case of simple embezzlement, no punishment was inflicted (Vol. III, p. 115) ; none again for persistently consorting, after solemn warning, with a suspected and forbidden woman (Vol. III, p. 115) ; none again upon a canon who, after a bad record for six years past, is now acting as vicar of a parish, where " the common report spreads and proclaims on all hands that he has lived in an abominable and disorderly fashion, and has run into debt with many persons ; from which accusations, when we brought them more fully against him, he was unable to clear himself " (Vol. III, p. 196). In consequence of a fatal brawl, the Visitor forbade the canons of Eggleston to wear daggers at their girdles, as Church law had long since forbidden it. Three years later, he found some still wearing their daggers, but there is no hint of punishment (Vol. II, p. 218, 220). Finally (to omit other examples which might be cited) a whole batch of apostates and incontinents are, on one occasion, left by the Visitor to the Abbot's correction (Vol. III, p. 162).

II. "Actually sent at once." This statement is, if possible, even more false than the first. In all, about thirty-eight persons were sentenced to different terms of banishment to other abbeys ; but in twenty-eight cases, or nearly 75 per cent., these sentences were mitigated on the spot, the Visitor himself (a) adding the proviso "unless, by way of mercy he be dispensed from this," or, (b), more frequently, yielding to the tears of the culprit and his friends, and following up his sentence with a "continuavimus"; i.e. holding over the punishment a year, or perhaps for three years, in the hope of amendment. Moreover, the lists of canons given at each visitation enable us to trace their movements fairly accurately; and these lists prove that the Visitor's sentence was often not carried out, even when he had not previously suspended it himself. For instance, the first of these unconditional sentences is that passed on W. Bentham, of Cockersand, who was convicted of "multiple" incontinence, and sentenced to Croxton for three years. This was December 13th, 1489; yet on April 26th, 1491, he is not only still at Cockersand, but has actually risen to the post of sub-prior! The next recorded instance is James Skipton, also of Cockersand, sentenced for incontinence to seven years at Sulby. Yet he also is still at Cockersand in 1491, and promoted to cellarer; in 1494 he is still there, and in an equally responsible office; and in 1502 he became abbot of Cockersand! (Vol. II, pp. 117 ff: Vict. County Hist., Lancs., Vol. II, p. 156). A few minutes' search would have convinced Cardinal Gasquet that these offenders were not actually banished; yet he serenely takes his bill and writes down as a summary of this very record: "two canons found guilty of incontinence and punished severely." It is true that the Visitor also sentenced them to forty days of penance; but what reason have we for supposing that this part of the sentence was not privately disobeyed, when we know that the major part was so unblushingly neglected? After going through all these lists myself, with something of the thoroughness with which the actual Editor should in conscience have gone through them, I can testify that the evidence points strongly towards the escape of at least threequarters of these culprits from the banishment to which they were sentenced. Things went a little better with the Provincial Chapter sentences (which the Cardinal, by the bye, does not notice). Out of the eleven sentences of banishment which we hear of only through these Chapter Decrees, five seem to have been actually carried out.

1. Only a fraction of the apostates were actually available for punishment ; the majority were evidently beyond the Visitor's reach, and are therefore not counted here.

Not only has the Cardinal blinked this, which would have been revealed by a few days of careful comparison between his different documents, but he repeatedly falsifies even the facts which lie on the very surface of each separate record. He prefaces each Report with a summary of its contents in English. To take these again in order from the beginning. W. Hymmers, of Alnwick, is condemned to Dale pro perpetuo, but with the usual mitigation nisi alias. The Cardinal quietly omits this nisi alias, and records "is severely punished," though in fact the documents show that Hymmers remained at home (Vol. II, pp. 19 ff). So with the next case (Vol. II, p. 36), where the nisi alias is again blinked. In the next (Vol. II, p. 36) the bulk of the punishment was remitted on the spot, and even the remaining twenty days of penance were left to the Abbot's discretion; yet here again the Cardinal summarizes "is severely punished." In the next (Vol. II, p. 66) an unmitigated rascal was sentenced to six years of banishment; execution, however, was at once formally deferred, and in fact the documents show that he never went. The Cardinal summarizes "is punished severely, and removed to another house." In the next again (Vol. II, p. 76) sentence was deferred, as usual, in the same breath in which it was pronounced; but the summary runs "is sent to another monastery." Nor can this be explained by ignorance of the technical term continuavimus ; for the Cardinal occasionally lapses into a correct and conscientious translation of this word.

III. Thirdly, it can be proved that some even of the worst offenders did not " lose their rights belonging to a member of the community." Here, again, even the most cursory study of the actual documents reveals an enormous gap between theory and practice. We have already seen how the two Cockersand criminals, instead of being degraded, were actually promoted. Let us take another instance from the monastery of Sulby (Vol. III, pp. 112–116 ; Vol. I, p. 176). In 1491, Robert Bredon, sub-prior, was found guilty of very gross immoralities, and sentenced to forty days of penance, and banishment to Alnwick for seven years ; but, in consideration of his tears and promises, the punishment was deferred, to give him a further chance. In 1494 we find him still at Sulby, not only sub-prior but also sacrist, and still wallowing in his sins. Again, Richard Ralston, of Welbeck, confessed, in 1488, to " multiple incontinence." He was sentenced to forty days on bread and water and three years' banishment ; but there is no trace of his name on the lists of any other monastery. He was not at Welbeck in 1491, but he may well have been wandering about outside in apostasy, as so many others were. When next he appears, in 1504, he is Abbot of Wendling ! (Vol. III, p. 197). Finally, John Newynton, of St. Radegund's, was excommunicated once again, at the visitation of 1488, as an apostate who had been " frequently " excommunicated already. In 1491 we find this John Newynton actually Abbot of St. Radegund's ; in 1497 " the whole monastery alleges the greatest enormities against him," but in 1500 he is still abbot, and the convent again accuses him of the adulteries and other crimes already detailed above (Vol. III, p. 105). It is useless to put forward any psychological theory which might explain how, in the face of these facts, Cardinal Gasquet can write as he does, even under cover of his imperfect system of references. The facts stare us in the face from the original documents ; but what percentage of readers ever travels beyond an Editor's preface and summaries ?

False Summaries.

The following instances will give an idea of the liberties which the Cardinal has permitted himself in these summaries.

Vol. II, p. 26. " Publica aures nostras propulsavit fama, eo quod fratres dicti monasterii frequentius usque villam de Alnewik vadunt, et presertim ad loca suspecta." This the Cardinal renders " There was a report that the Canons frequented the town of Alnwick too much." Yet the words I have underlined and which he has omitted are the stock legal phrases used in visitation documents ; fama publica means legally " the general consent of trustworthy witnesses in the district " and suspectus means " disreputable " : cf. Vol. II, p. 78, " ad loca suspecta et ad mulierem suspectam."

Vol. II, p. 55. " Item, in noctibus, post Completorium, fratres exeunt claustrum, et tandiu vigilant et potationibus utuntur, quod in mediis noctibus, tempore matutinarum, vigilare non possunt."

G. " The canons sometimes give themselves to potations at night."

Vol. II, p. 76. G. "A canon, accused of incontinence . . . is sent to another monastery for punishment and threatened with perpetual imprisonment." As a matter of fact, the canon was not only accused, but convicted; he failed in his attempted compurgation. The banishment was not inflicted, but suspended, continuavimus, a word which the Cardinal translates quite correctly in other places.

Vol. II, p. 107, 110. This summary entirely suppresses the fact that the Abbot of Cockersand had been accused by the Visitor of things which, propter suorum (sic) enormitatem, had been reserved for the General Chapter to deal with; and that the Abbot, dissimulatione exquisita, had managed to suppress this part of the report. This may be added to the cases already cited in which grave offences are not recorded to have been punished.

Vol. II, p. 177 (Dale). G. "One canon found guilty of disobedience."
Text. "De vicio inobediencie . . . . et multis enormibus aliis et excessibus, impetitus."

Vol. III, p. 25 (Langley). G. "Bishop Redman, on strictest enquiry, finds the reports of incontinence against the Abbot to be untrue." Yet the summary omits to add that there is "maxima infamia . . . per circuitum diffusa," and that the Bishop commanded the Abbot, under pain of excommunication, never again to admit the suspected woman to the monastery, or permit her to dwell in any place thereunto appertaining.

Vol. III, p. 80. The summary mentions that one canon had thrice apostatized, but omits that another canon and a nun were also in apostasy. Similarly, Vol. II, p. 35, though three are named in the text as apostates, the Cardinal only sees one.

Vol. III, p. 104. G. "The suggested offences." Compare the word which I have here italicized with the actual text on p. 103 and the two paragraphs at the top of p. 105, where it is recorded that the whole monastery joined in accusing the Abbot of these offences. Compare similarly, the summary on p. 68 with the actual text.

Vol. III, p. 146. G. "One canon convicted of apostasy, rebellion and theft."
Text. "Super apostasia, incontinentia, furto, et manifesta rebellione multipliciter diffamatum et convictum."
This list is far from exhaustive, but it will suffice.

BR
252
C68
1915
c.1
ROBA